With gratitude to Asher Horowitz, for many years of intellectual guidance, encouragement, and support. I continue to be inspired by his passion for rigorous thinking, by his critical approach to the projects of modern political philosophy, and by his exceptional intellectual integrity which ceaselessly resists disappearing into the comfort of the given.

I would like to extend a special thanks to Shannon Bell for all her unflinching help and support. My engagement with Emmanuel Levinas began in her graduate course in which she introduced Levinas to her graduate students. I would like to extend a special thanks to Alice Pitt. Over many years, her probing questions helped push my intellectual journey in new and interesting directions.

I would also like to extend my deepest gratitude to Gad Horowitz whose continuous presence and support has greatly shaped my journey in life. His course in “spirit of democratic citizenship,” among others, has greatly influenced my subsequent academic work and research.

I am grateful to Daniel Quinlan, my editor at the University of Toronto Press, who saw this book through its many iterations, and to Matthew Kudelka for copy editing the manuscript.

To my mother: I love you. Your amorous presence in my life continuously renders possible the manifestation of a love that does not expect much in return. And to my father, who believed in me and pushed me to break the traditional gender boundaries in a culture which, like any other culture, was mired with sexism and misogyny. And finally, to my dear son, Siavash: the spirit of this course is for your young, kind, and generous heart Azizam.

I would like to dedicate this work to the memory of thousands of political activists who lost their lives during and after the Iranian revolution of 1979, especially to my three close friends, Mohammad, Bijan, and Ghassem, three beautiful souls whose only crime was to dream about a better world.
