

Acknowledgments

Alone Together explores how the works of single authors may nevertheless instantiate collective modes of composition, and it bears the mark of the many colleagues and friends who have helped me think through both the problems I study in it and my way of presenting them. From the beginning, Simone Pinet encouraged me to pursue my scholarly interests with sincerity and helped me to do so with conceptual rigour; our more recent collaborations have continually pushed me to rethink and refine my approach to medieval studies. Josiah Blackmore has been a model of intellectual and professional generosity, and an inspiring reader of poetry. Cynthia Robinson showed how scholarly boundaries can only be pushed by the most scrupulous work. Cary Howie sparked my interest in literary theologians and critical poetics.

I am grateful to colleagues at Transylvania University, Miami University of Ohio, the University of Chicago, Harvard University, and the University of Massachusetts Amherst for their insightful questions and comments at presentations of material that would become part of this book, and also to the many colleagues who listened carefully and responded to conference presentations. It is my sincere hope that the critical acumen of Jean Dangler, Emily Francomano, Ryan Giles, Albert Lloret, Sol Miguel-Prendes, David Nirenberg, and Julian Weiss is in some way reflected in my analysis.

At the University at Buffalo, I am grateful for the support and intellectual community afforded by all of my colleagues in the Department of Romance Languages and Literatures and the Humanities Institute's Early Modern Research Workshop. I am particularly indebted to David Castillo, both for early feedback that led to a substantial restructuring of the book's argument and for focused comments on a completed draft. Hal Langfur offered thoughtful encouragement at key moments. A graduate seminar on Petrarch and Petrarchism taught in collaboration with Paola Ugolini offered a space to re-examine important aspects of the poetry of Ausiàs March and other authors included in this study. I have also benefitted from the curiosity and good humour reliably exhibited by my undergraduate and graduate students over the last several years.

Essential research for this book was supported by a National Library of Portugal and Luso-American Development Foundation Short-Term Research Grant, as well as a Kenan Research Grant from Transylvania University. An earlier version of chapter two appeared in Hispanic Review (spring 2016) under the title “Alfonso de Madrigal, el Tostado, on the Politics of Friendship.” Copyright © 2016 University of Pennsylvania Press. All rights reserved. The epigraph is from “Chemin de Fer” from POEMS by Elizabeth Bishop. Copyright © 2011 by The Alice H. Methfessel Trust. Publisher’s Note and compilation copyright © 2011 by Farrar, Straus and Giroux. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux. All rights reserved.

Many friends have contributed in ways large and small to the shape this book would eventually take. Among them are Beth Bouloukos, Robert Davidson, António and Kathryn de Ridder-Vignone, Wilson Dickinson, Juan Manuel Espinosa, Peter Northup, Ben Novotny Owen, Jeremy Paden, Juan Sierra, Daniel Stiffer, Daniel Tonozzi, William Viestenz, and Zac Zimmer.

Throughout the publication process, the advice and support of Suzanne Rancourt have been indispensable. In addition to her work on the index, Carla DeSantis provided excellent editorial assistance. The comments of the manuscript’s anonymous readers helped me to focus and clarify the main threads of my argument and also to eliminate some historical imprecisions. Any remaining errors are my own.

In writing a book on medieval attempts to shape and control the passions, I discovered some of my own limitations in this respect. I am grateful for the support of my mother, Joan Berlin, my aunt Sharon Lapkin Matenko, and my late grandmother Lena Winesanker, and I can only hope one day to repay the patience that my daughter Rosa Aurelia Negrete Berlin has shown me over the past four years. Finally, this book would never have been completed without the love and critical attention of my wife, Fernanda Negrete, who has made the difference in my life since the day we met. Alone Together is dedicated to her.