

Acknowledgments

Writing the acknowledgments for a first book, especially one that has been a part of my life for such an extended time, is a rare opportunity to reflect and take stock of the last ten-plus years. Writing and researching are often solitary endeavours, but my community of friends, mentors, family, colleagues, and students enlivened and emboldened this work and made the process of writing it bearable. This community has made this work so much more than it could ever be had I struggled unaccompanied on this journey.

As this work began as part of doctoral research, my first thanks go to my incredible mentor and doctoral supervisor, Dr. Valerie J. Korinek. Your support, teaching, and dry wit have been invaluable to the work in this book and in the shaping of the scholar I am today. I only hope that I can live up to your example of mentorship and feminist guidance. Thanks also to the members of my committee at the University of Saskatchewan for their consistent open-door policy and willingness to share their varied expertise. Appreciation also goes out to my friends and class cohort from that time: thanks for the ideas, laughs, and for your willingness to babysit my oldest daughter so that I could attempt to string two thoughts together.

Financially, this work was supported primarily by a SSHRC Doctoral Fellowship with revisions being completed while teaching at Memorial University of Newfoundland and Vancouver Island University. Short-term contracts that build in time for research are rare, and I have been extremely lucky to get two such employments that allowed me to do the necessary revisions on this manuscript as well as providing wonderful colleagues to work amongst. I am also grateful to my colleagues at the University of Lethbridge, who have supported me during what turned out to be a very unusual start to my employment: your encouragement and humour have been invaluable as I find my feet. I would also be remiss if I did not give grateful thanks to the many administrative assistants I have been privileged to work with over the years. Without your work none of our work would be possible. I am also grateful for the assistance of the archivists at each of the archives to which I was privileged to be granted access, especially those at the Anglican Archives of Canada and the United Church Archives of Canada, for their aid in finding obscure pamphlets, marriage manuals, and other publications.

Crucially, this work would also have not been possible without the wisdom and words of the eighteen women who bravely answered my advertisement asking for women who married between 1939 and 1966 to tell me about their lives and answer some “cheeky” questions. Ladies, you invited me into your homes, trusted me with your secrets and the intimate details of your lives, and made me laugh and cry with your stories. I hope I have done your words justice.

Working with Len Husband and the staff at the University of Toronto Press has been a lovely experience for me as a first-time author. I am also grateful for the feedback from the three anonymous reviewers who read the manuscript and helped to shepherd it in its journey from research to monograph. I am especially appreciative of the third reviewer, who stepped in after one of the other reviewers could not complete the process.

Finally, my family has been instrumental to the completion of this book. These few simple words of acknowledgment cannot hope to suffice in expressing the debt of gratitude I owe to each of you. Milt and Shirley Stanley, thank you for the foundational love of learning you instilled within me and your unwavering support for this and all other endeavours in my life. To my in-laws Carol and Jack, thanks for letting me come to your house and write and for providing me with endless cups of coffee and endless hours of childcare. To my extended family (on both sides!) thank you for championing me in this work and supporting me through this process. Jonathan Clapperton, you were the first person to hear the question that would become the central theme of this book, and your support of it, and me, has not wavered. You have read and re-read this work so many times and each time you helped make it stronger. You are always my first editor and my favourite collaborator. I am so glad I agreed to read over your term paper all those years ago. Finally, to my daughters Alexis and Lucy, this manuscript has been a background feature of your entire lives. (Perhaps sometimes it felt like an unwelcome interloper). But you were (and are) a constant source of inspiration and joy. Thank you for being you.
