Books are the product of uncountable small moments over the lives of their authors. Only in retrospect might we realize how important these moments were for making them possible. I am grateful to the many people who unwittingly helped me write this book. I was lucky to encounter Antonio Abad, a primary school teacher who recognized my dyslexia, and Ángel Crespo, my teacher in high school who, when lecturing on Mary Shelley's Frankenstein, showed me what it means to really read a novel. In higher education, I was fortunate to have a supportive group of scholars who taught me how to be in the profession: most notably I want to thank Gail Bulman, Debra Castillo, John Kronik, Joan Ramon Resina, and Alicia Vadillo, who contributed to my education in Syracuse and Cornell. Many friends and colleagues, too numerous to be named, were also important to my intellectual growth. Pedro Pérez del Solar's vast knowledge of la Movida helped me reframe my ideas about the period. Montse Pérez-Toribio and Rosi Song deserve special mention for encouraging me to develop the project that became this book. Bob Davidson's stimulating friendship combines high and low, and continues to be a source of creative and critical inspiration. My colleagues in the Hispanic Studies department at Brown provided a vital intellectual home for me. The Kitchen Underground – I could not make it without you – has kept me laughing and well fed over the past decade. Sharing mountains and cold Mahou with old friends in Madrid kept this academic expat grounded. Gracias colegas for always keeping it real.

Institutions, too, play a role in making books. Many thanks to the Provost Office at Wheaton College (MA) for making this book possible. I would like to thank the library staff at Wheaton and Brown University for their help in the researching of this book. Thanks also to Farleigh Dickinson University Press for allowing us to reproduce sections of chapter 3. Thanks to Covadonga García for searching the archives of the Biblioteca Nacional in Madrid on my behalf. And finally, my deepest thanks go to the anonymous reviewers of this book. They selflessly contribute, together with countless colleagues all over the world, to make scholarship better. Any mistakes, omissions, or erroneous conclusions are my own.

My family has also been instrumental in the creation of this book. In memoriam of José Luis Córdoba and Domingo Córdoba for teaching me what creativity is all about, and to Immaculada Córdoba and Isidro Moreno for opening, always with a witty wisecrack, the doors and windows to the joys of education and of life. The unconditional support of my parents, Ángeles Dolores Córdoba and Paco Fernández de Alba, their patience, and their long-term view resulted in my unpredictably ending up with a PhD. Their endless intellectual curiosity and their thirst for knowledge are an everyday reminder of the power of self-education. I can only hope that I become to my children the ethical model that my parents have been for me. María, Jose, and Marga, my incomparable siblings, make me proud every day, as they exemplify what it means to be dedicated to public service. Once I moved to the United States, Kate Coffey and her extended family took me in as one of their own, putting up with my culture shock and bad accent. Boundlessly intelligent, generous, and compassionate, Kate helped me become a better person, and I am eternally grateful to her.

My children, Kiko and Elías, show me every day the wonderment of growing up as creative and caring boys. Finally, Alizah Holstein, the Jedi of words and images, the anchor of my life, you are my inspiration to become more generous, creative, and awoken to the small beautiful things of the world. Ali, Kiko, and Elías, thank you for the gift of happiness.
