Writing this book led me into a research journey that was enriched by many encounters – either in person or mediated by other texts. Although it would take too long to retrace this path entirely, I would like to mention a few people who have been particularly helpful.

For sparking my interest in the crepusculars and advising my undergraduate research into these poets, I thank Mauro Novelli and Roberto Carnero. My investigation of the crepuscular poets has enormously benefited from the work of Angela Ida Villa and Giuseppe Farinelli, and from the conversations I had with them. In a similar way, I am thankful to Federico Luisetti for suggesting critical perspectives that reframed my understanding of the futurist avant-garde. Overall, my theoretical approach was inspired by the work of many colleagues. A special thanks goes to Serenella Iovino for suggesting readings about feminist environmentalism that, in a later phase of my writing process, contributed in shaping this book and my current research. I would also like to thank Levi Bryant for talking with me about his view of object-oriented ontology, Elena Past for her valuable insights on nonhuman sounds, and Matteo Gilebbi for sharing with me his knowledge of animal studies. Also, thank you to Mimmo Cangiano for offering advice on Italian modernism, Achille Castaldo for providing feedback on passages of the book, and Paola Ehrmantraut for discussing with me her research on masculinity studies and affect theory. Finally, Valeria Finucci was the first to encourage me to revise my doctoral dissertation. “I see a book here,” she said.

However, this book would not have been possible without the work of Mark Thompson, acquisition editor at University of Toronto Press, who believed in this project and assisted me during the revision process with great professionalism. In this process, the constructive criticism of the anonymous external reviewers was crucial in helping me to improve my manuscript.

Also, as a non-native speaker of English, I found that writing a book in the English language requires extra time and effort. Thank you, Mary Reichardt and Betsy Tremmel, for reading drafts of my chapters and offering suggestions on language and style.

Last but not least, I would like to thank Mike, my husband, for becoming the most knowledgeable non-academic expert in crepuscularism and supporting – with a good dose of crepuscular irony – the ups and downs of my writing process. Thank you, Felicita, for being the best more-than-human companion of long writing sessions and making me laugh when I found you asleep on my poetry books several times. I am concluding this page with a personal note: I signed the contract for this book a few weeks before my daughter, Maria-Sofia, was born, and I submitted the final revisions a few weeks after she was born. In an academic world in which many women in tenure-track careers still think that they must choose between being a scholar and being a mother, this book is an invite to challenge the system that fuels this idea.
