This book began life in early 2017 as a discussion between the co-editors, Michael King and Richard Nesbitt. We were debating how the financial-services industry was changing post-crisis, particularly as a result of the arrival of fintech. We organized a one-day conference in Toronto on 23 June 2017, titled The Future of Banking and Financial Services, jointly sponsored by the Scotiabank Digital Banking at Ivey Business School and the Global Risk Institute in Financial Services (GRI). The positive feedback from that event convinced us that we needed to share the insights from our expert speakers with a broader audience, which led to this edited volume. We gratefully acknowledge the financial support for this project from Scotiabank, the Tangerine Chair in Finance at Western University's Ivey Business School, and the Lansdowne Chair in Finance at University of Victoria's Gustavson School of Business.

We wish to thank each of the authors who contributed their considerable knowledge to the chapters of this book. These global experts from Canada, the United States, and the United Kingdom provide us with a rare insight into how the financial services industry will evolve in the decade ahead. While many commentators expect the disruption to pick up pace, few are willing to predict how these changes will impact customers and the financial institutions that serve them. The authors in this book boldly outline how the customer financial experience will be transformed in the future. We also acknowledge the many experts that we consulted in preparing these chapters who are not named as authors. They were invaluable in answering our questions and sharing their views on key developments in their industry. Finally, we thank Jennifer DiDomenico and the team at University of Toronto Press for their guidance and support.
