

Acknowledgments

This book would not have been possible without support from various entities and individuals. I am especially grateful to my home institution, the University of San Diego, for a variety of travel grants, course releases, and subvention funds that allowed me to have the time and resources to write this book. I am particularly indebted to Deans Noelle Norton and Kristin Moran.

I also express my warmest thanks to the University of Toronto Press, especially my editor, Mark Thompson, whose guidance and support for this project have been tremendously helpful. Likewise, I also thank the entire staff of the Filmoteca Española, especially José Luis Estarona, Trinidad del Río Sánchez, and Anabel Bueno, who assisted me over a period of several years with viewing films and obtaining access to many of the images printed in this book. Similarly, I thank Bertelsmann Music Group and Warner Chappell Music for granting me permission to print the lyrics of Peret's song "El mig amic." I also thank Hal Leonard LLC for allowing me to reprint the lyrics of Peret's song "El gitano Antón" and the Latin American original on which it is based, "El negro bembón."

I am immensely grateful to friends and colleagues who read earlier drafts of my chapters, including Jeffrey Coleman, Mary Kate Donovan, Rebecca Ingram, Tamara Moya Jorge, Gema Pérez Sánchez, Jonathon Repinecz, and Eva Woods-Peiró, as well the anonymous readers of my manuscript. Their thoughtful feedback enabled me to strengthen this work as much as possible.

I absolutely could not, under any circumstances, have written this book without the steadfast companionship and encouragement of a number of close friends both at USD and in my field. I am indebted in this regard to USD colleagues Peter Mena and Greg Prieto, as well as to my writing group colleagues Dean Albritton, Joanne Britland, Leslie Harkema, Catalina Iannone, Gaby Miller, Anita Savo, Wan Tang, and Sarah Thomas. There were innumerable moments when I simply did not have the energy, confidence or resilience to keep going. If I somehow managed to pull myself to the finish line, it is largely thanks to them.

Similarly, the intellectual community afforded by TRECE (Taller de Raza, Etnicidad y Ciudadanía en España), a group of scholars who work on critical race studies in Spain, provided me indispensable inspiration and motivation to write this book. I offer my warmest thanks to all those who have joined us in planning or participating in our seminars, conferences, and reading sessions. Although there are perhaps too many to name individually here, your insights have proven critical to this project and to my growth as a scholar more broadly.

I am also grateful to my California-based colleagues Roberta Johnson, Santiago Morales-Rivera, and Maite Zubiaurre who convinced me that this project needed to be a book, and not just an article, after I first presented a piece of it as an invited lecture at UCLA for the Peninsularistas of Southern California Symposium years ago. I also offer my heartfelt gratitude to H. Rosi Song and Benita Sampedro, whose expressions of kindness and support over the years have simply been too numerous to list here.

I will never be able to repay the debt I owe to my PhD advisers from Duke, Stephanie Sieburth and Roberto Dainotto, whose guidance and training profoundly shape all my intellectual endeavours. The same is true of Tabea Linhard, who introduced me to the field of Spanish film studies as an undergraduate in 2004, as well as Justin Crumbaugh, who ignited my curiosity about late-Francoist popular cinema in a graduate seminar he taught at Duke in 2008.

On a personal note, I thank my immediate family, including my parents, Marty and Yolanda Repinecz, my twin brother and academic co-conspirator Jonathon, as well as my partner Bhanu Yerra. There are no words that could adequately express my gratitude for your love.
