Acknowledgments

This book was a lot of hard work – not for me so much as for the many people who have put up with me over the past decade. The number of people and organizations without whom this text would have been far poorer (or not existed at all) is immense. The project spanned several continents and four nations (Akwesasne, Canada, the United States, and Germany); consequently, there is a lot of acknowledging to do. Readers have my apologies for the length of this section. Digital readers may save time by pressing "Control-F" to search for their own names.

My family has supported me through every stage of this process, offering advice, encouragement, and a substantial number of bagels. First and foremost, I wish to thank my mother, Andrea Kalman, and my father, Kenneth Kalman, who never wavered in their support and love. My sister, Rachel Kalman, offered clever bits of advice and was never afraid to challenge me. My grandparents, Eli and Zelda Kalman and Robert and Rita Kessler, always provided unconditional affection.

The reason this book has been published is thanks to the persistent, never-ending encouragement of Christopher Alcantara. Chris never gave up on me, and in so doing, made it impossible for me to give up on this project.

It may be overdoing it to thank the entire populations of New York, China, Ukraine, and Turkey, but I'd like to point out a few people whose friendship has remained a constant beacon throughout my travels. Drew Gulley, Bedra Girgin, Lisa Brunner, Laura Frantz, Lilya Askarova, George Rowe, Anna Matviyenko, Sean Speciale, Shanti Marthaller, Tyson Pierce, Gillian Groenen, Jacqueline Haslam, and Olga Andrusych have all conspired to make me a more fun and caring person. Jena Barchas-Liechtenstein gets a sentence but deserves a chapter for her seamless balancing of hugs and brilliance. Lee Solomon and my brothers in all but genetics, Jeremy and Adam Scholem, were always there for sharing cheap Scotch and priceless advice. In Montreal, my ideas were developed over video games with Steven Sych; beers with Brodie Noga, Sean Desjardins, Nicholas Barber, and Jennie Glassco; whisky with Takeshi Uesugi, Fern Thompsett, Sarah Sandham, and Joshua Friesen; magic soup with Doerte Bemme and Stephanie Alexander; Marxism with Marco Poppalardo; walks with Hannah Kiezenler and Cees Van Dvke; pho with Karen McAllister; tea with Julia Bailey; raclette with Marie-Pierre Gadoua; tavla with Giulia El-Dardiry; papusas with Alonso Gamara; kale and anarchy with Erica Lagalisse; salt with Saman Tabasi-Najad; carnitas with Camilo Gomez; barbecue with Amber Silva; hot chocolate with Monica Cuellar Gempeler; board games with Katie Sinclair; Game of Thrones with Adam Fleischmann, Kristin Flemons, and Raad Fadaak; football with Loes Knappen and Andrew McCaan; cake with Stephanie Olson and Rob Boddice; dim sum(day) with Claudia Masferrer and Renato Calleja; lobster rolls with Ivet Reves Maturano and Richard Feldman; karaoke with Victor "Corey" Wright; and Chinese food with everyone else.

Jessica Dolan and Daniel Rueck helped me learn about Haudenosaunee studies from new perspectives, and Phillip Messier taught me to always justify myself. Sebastien Bluteau and Gregory Brass were exceptional roommates and helped me ask questions I had not even thought of. Rine Vieth taught me that just because anthropologists ruin everything, that does not mean we cannot be fun. A special thanks to my dear Belgians, Melanie Chaplier and Lionel Neyts, whose gastronomic, emotional, and intellectual contributions are too numerous for this page.

At McGill, Kristin Norget, Eduardo Kohn, and Setrag Manoukian gave me insights I never would have had otherwise. John Hall, Katherine Muller, Diana Allan, Allan Young, Katherine Lemons, and Nicole Couture also met with me to develop the project. At the University of Montreal, Karine Côté-Boucher and John Leavitt dedicated their time to discuss border officers and myths and helped me see the ways in which the two are more similar than one may first imagine. Toby Morantz welcomed me into her home and made me feel that I had a Jewish family north of the border. I am also grateful to my colleagues Mike Loft, Nicole Ives, Kirsten Anker, Jill Hanley, and Courtney Montour for organizing the Interdisciplinary Field Course in Indigenous Studies and enabling me to spend my summers in Kahnawake with exceptional students. Rose-Marie Stano, Diane Mann, Anne Farray, and Connie Di Giuseppe always had time for "just one more question" from me. Olga Harmazy gets special mention, both for providing assistance and for a brief respite any time we spoke.

Most graduate students are fortunate if they have a good supervisor. I was blessed with two. Colin Scott and Ronald Niezen provided encouragement when I needed it, work when I needed it, advice when I needed it, and positive models of scholarship and integrity always.

Richard C. Jeffrey, on the other hand, did not help.

In Germany, I am indebted to Jonathan Bernearts and Faduma Abukar for the advice and laughs over superhero stories. Thanks as well to Agathe Mora, Jon Schubert, Mareike Reidel, Andrea Klein, Hendrik Tieke, Miriam Francina, Lucia and Jens Frobel, Esther Horat, Sajjad Safaei, the Advokaten Piraten, Kiran Morjaria, Kalindi Kokal, Harika Dauth, and vegan soup. Special gratitude to Timm Sureau, Christina Turzer, Markus Klank, and Susanne Vollert, for giving me a true sense of home in Halle and Leipzig respectively.

At the Max Planck Institute, Bertram and Jutta Turner provided advice, maps, wine, and a cat, with the first two transforming this book into a more complete and rigorous piece of scholarship. Maria Sapignoli, Julie Billaud, Brian Donahoe, and Katrin Seidel taught me not simply how to develop my project but how to develop as a scholar. Marie-Claire Foblets has my dearest gratitude; she supported my time at the institute, and her advice made it possible for me to develop ideas I never would have had the confidence to explore otherwise.

Here in Vietnam, my life is made sane through collaborations with my amazing students and my friends and colleagues: Jill Sirikantraporn, Kevin Hart, Nguyễn Cẩm Vân, Lương Ngọc Trâm, Aaron Anderson, Andrew Bellisari, Tram Luong, Phan Vũ Xuân Hùng, Trương Thị Thạch Thảo, Antoine Touch, Sebastian Dziallas, and Samhitha Raj. Extra cảm on for Lê Nguyễn Thiên Hương, for helping make every day worthwhile.

None of this would have been possible without the support of my friends in Akwesasne. Ashley Tarbell introduced me to the community and remains a friend to this day – I have been blessed to know her and her amazing family. Curtis Lazore shared his love of the land and some of my favorite conversations over our lunch breaks. I am especially glad I met Phillip White-Cree on a bus ride to Ottawa, as I continue to take pleasure in our conversations on traditional knowledge and Doctor Who. Debbie Rourke, Jacey Rourke, and Jeffrey Rodriguez were my family when I was far away from my own.

I was fortunate to have tremendous institutional support in Akwesasne. I am grateful to Mike Mitchell for meeting with me and supporting my project in the territory along with the Mohawk Council of Akwesasne (MCA), the Saint Regis Mohawk Tribe, and the Mohawk Nation Council of Chiefs. At the MCA, I am especially indebted to the Aboriginal rights research office where I spent most of my year of fieldwork. I also wish to thank Joyce King and the Justice Department, and Cactus Cook-Sunday, the director of ARRO. In the Mohawk Nation, I want to extend a nia:wen to Bula Hill and Richard Mitchell. Although Rasennes Pembleton may not know it, he always asked me the hardest questions and had the deepest insights of anyone I spoke with. While most of my interviews with border officers are kept anonymous, I wish to thank those who took the time and accepted the risk of speaking to me, and J.D. Marchand for going above and beyond in his patience and willingness to meet with me.

Raymond Fogelson is not the reason I am an anthropologist, but if I am ever to be considered a good anthropologist, it will be because of him. Professor Fogelson showed an eager, confused, curious undergraduate that a well-told story teaches a whole lot more than a well-written textbook. He was the educator and scholar I aspire to be some day. He is also possibly to blame if there are too many jokes in this text.

Everything good in the next several hundred pages is thanks to the above individuals, and many whom I was unable to name. Everything bad, or false, is because I did not listen to them when I should have.

I wish to end these acknowledgments with my thanks to both the Mohawk Community of Akwesasne and the lands and waters occupied by their ancestors since time immemorial.
