I remember clearly that sunny spring day at Stanford University. It was 2015, and I was walking to the History Department when I received an email from my doctoral adviser, Edith Sheffer. She wanted to know what had happened to queer Germans during the Cold War. That seemingly simple question launched me on the research that eventually became this book. In the years since, Edith has been an unwavering friend and mentor. She has read too many drafts of this work to count and has never ceased to offer incisive, generous critiques of it, for which I am profoundly grateful. It would not be the book it is without her.

Over the last several years, J.P. Daughton, Adrian Daub, Pieter Judson, and Matthew Sommer also read numerous drafts of this manuscript. Their feedback shaped the book's arguments and helped me to think expansively about the stakes of this work. I am indebted to them for their guidance and their friendship.

In graduate school I was lucky to find a tight-knit cohort of German historians. Ian Beacock, Benjamin Hein, and Michelle Kahn were always happy to peruse new chapters or think through fresh ideas. We became fast friends during my six years in the Bay Area, and I cherish my relationships with them.

During my California years, I was also fortunate to befriend Paul Robinson, who has been both a generous mentor and a forgiving bridge partner.

In 2019 I came to George Mason University's Department of History and Art History, and I consider myself lucky to have joined such a congenial and intellectually stimulating group of colleagues. This book has profited immensely from their engagement with and support of it.

In May 2020, in the early weeks of the COVID-19 pandemic, an international group of scholars logged onto Zoom for a workshop dedicated to discussing this manuscript. I am incredibly grateful to Monica Black,

Anna von der Goltz, Dan Healey, Steve Barnes, Alison Landsberg, and Sam Lebovic for the care they took in reading it, especially in the midst of a global health emergency. Their critiques and suggestions made it a far more compelling book. My thanks also go to Joan Bristol, who generously took notes during the workshop.

As I researched, wrote, and rewrote this book, my work benefited from conference panels, workshop presentations, and conversations with colleagues around the world. For their help, encouragement, and faith in this project, I thank Scott Arcenas, Josh Armstrong, Keith Baker, Robert Beachy, Maria Borowski, Robert DeCaroli, Jeremy DeWaal, Rowan Dorin, Jennifer Evans, Christopher Ewing, Kyle Frackman, Estelle Freedman, Geoffrey Giles, David Halperin, Dagmar Herzog, Erik Huneke, Mills Kelly, Matthew Karush, Rüdiger Lautmann, Martin Lücke, Norman Naimark, Marti Lybeck, Sun-Young Park, Brian Platt, Andrew Port, Steven Press, Andrea Rottmann, Londa Schiebinger, Zachary Schrag, Randolph Scully, James Sheehan, Suzanne Smith, David Spreen, Veronika Springmann, Peter Stansky, Philipp Stelzel, Lauren Stokes, Katie Sutton, Carolyn Taratko, and Richard Wetzell.

Stephen Shapiro at University of Toronto Press has been a joy to work with, demystifying the often-stressful process of publishing my first book. Kate Blackmer produced two beautiful maps for this project, for which I thank her. I am also grateful to the three anonymous reviewers, whose suggestions substantially improved the final copy.

The research presented here would have been impossible without a legion of archivists who helped me along the way. My thanks go to Carsten Repke at the Stasi Archive; Martin Luchterhandt and Lydia Kiesling at the Berlin Regional Archive; Jean McElwee Cannon at the Hoover Institution Library and Archives; Kristine Schmidt at the Berlin Gay Museum Archive; Roland Pfirschke, Karin Schorsch, Michael Merchel, Petra Sprenger, and Ragna Petrak at the Saxony Main State Archive in Dresden; Michelle Bleidt at the Federal Archive in Koblenz; Martin Stingl and Sandra Schleinitz at the Karlsruhe General Regional Archive; and Johann Zilien at the Hessian Main Archive in Wiesbaden.

To my oral history partners, thank you. I hope I have done justice to your stories.

A number of institutions supported me while I researched, wrote, and revised. This work was funded by a Silas Palmer Fellowship from the Hoover Institution Library and Archives, two Lane Summer Research Grants from the Stanford Program in the History and Philosophy of Science, a G.J. Pigott Fellowship from the Stanford School of Humanities and Sciences, a Stanford–Free University Berlin Graduate Exchange Fellowship, a Graduate Research Grant from the Europe Center at Stanford, a Weter Fellowship from the Stanford History Department, a Mabelle McLeod Lewis Memorial Fund Dissertation Fellowship, grants from the George Mason Department of History and Art History Nelson Research Fund, and generous support, including research leave, from the George Mason College of Humanities and Social Sciences.

My path into the historical profession has been a long one that began as a middle school student. This book is also a product of the encouragement I received from mentors along the way, especially from Mike Ortmann at Lawrence High School and from Ute Brandes, Catherine Epstein, Heidi Gilpin, Christian Rogowski, and Ronald Rosbottom at Amherst College.

Working on this topic reminds me constantly of how fortunate I am to come from a loving family. A special thanks to my aunt and uncle Nancy Huneke and David Hamilton, who were my California home away from home; my cousins Alec Clowes, Sarah Clowes, and Edie Bowles; my aunts and uncles Mardi and Frank Bowles, Jon and Ev Clowes, Markie Clowes, and Susan Detweiler; and my German “parents” in Baden-Baden, Gisi Erbslöh and Burkhard Schlichting.

I am also lucky to have a large chosen family of friends. For their support over the years, I thank Max Alderman and Ben Cole, Chelsea Amegatcher, Nina Bernard, Casey Brennan, Olivier Bodson, Russell Burge, Rachel Chin, Nolan Danley, Nathaniel Edwards, James Frank, Isaac Gendelman and Jason Plesha, Franz Heitzer and Adrian Toschev, Richie Hofmann, Peter Johnston, Anjulie Kalsia, Akane Kanai, Jing Li, James Longbotham, Jared Miller, Julie Moorman, Sebastian Naumann, Tom Newton and Alex Chan, Roger Pellegrini and Harry Shamansky, Philip Schwada and Chris Farris, Matthew Sellers, Damien Soghoian, Alex Speir, Rebecca Wall, and David Westwood and Carolyn Brotherton.

Most important, to my partner, Hugh Ross, thank you for the years of adventure, love, and encouragement as I wrote, revised, and fretted about this book.

Finally, I feel lucky every day to have my immediate family. My brother and sister-in-law Ned and Erin Huneke are humorous, loving presences in my life, always happy to recommend a good novel or a new pie recipe. My parents, Edith Clowes and Craig Huneke, have encouraged my interest in history since I was a twelve-year-old kid reading biographies of Henry VIII. They have never ceased to support me, even when I did not always believe I would see this project through to completion. This book is dedicated to them.
