As I prepared to write this section of my book, I realized that despite all the work (sudor y lágrimas) that I, myself, put into this project, it would not have been possible without the support and encouragement of the many people I met during this journey. While I have always been intrigued by human memory, its faulty and yet decisive function for our identity, my formal engagement with the topic started ten years ago when I presented on memory for the first time at the groundbreaking first conference on Cognitive Futures for the Humanities at the University of Bangor in the UK. There I met the incomparable Alan Richardson, which began a series of extraordinary conversations on the significance of memory and imagination that continued at subsequent Cognitive Futures conferences at the University of Durham and Oxford University, respectively. These interactions planted the seed for what later would become Quixotic Memories, which subsequently developed into two essays published in volumes edited by Isabel Jaén and Julien Simon and a third edited by Steven Wagschal and Ryan D. Giles. I thank all of them for their careful reading, helpful suggestions, and impeccable professionalism.

Since that time, my thoughts on memory in Cervantes's work have been refined through numerous conference presentations and other publications. Hence, I would also like to acknowledge the Cervantes Society of America, the Renaissance Society of America, and the Modern Language Association for allowing me to present my ideas at their annual conferences. For their incredible inspiration; unconditional support; and valuable ideas, comments, and criticism, I thank all the Cervantistas and other scholars who listened to my talks and offered their encouragement to me along the way. A number of colleagues have been generous with time and inspiration, and so I am indebted to Lina Bolzoni, Frederick de Armas, Edward Friedman, Enrique García

Santo-Tomás, Howard Mancing, and Alan Richardson for their willingness to read and comment on portions of the book. I would also like to express my gratitude to my dear friend and colleague Elisa Rizo for her excitement and kindness throughout this long journey.

I am extremely grateful to Suzanne Rancourt and the University of Toronto Press for their interest in publishing my work and to the anonymous peer reviewers for their enthusiasm, careful evaluation, and fruitful suggestions. Toronto has been thorough and vigilant, and the experience working with the press has been wonderful. I also thank Chad M. Gasta and Heather Dubnick for their amazing work translating sections of my text, correcting my English, and editing the final manuscript.

A project as vast as this could not have happened without the generous funding from my academic home, Iowa State University. From the dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences to the Office of the Provost to the Cassling Family Foundation and the Center for the Excellence in the Arts and the Humanities, I have received wonderful support for my research at ISU. I am also thankful to the Iowa State University Publication Endowment, ISU Foundation, for their support for the publication of this work. I also recognize the Interlibrary Loan Office at Parks Library. Were it not for their remarkable efforts, many of the source materials and other resources for this project would have not been available to me.

I would not be here without the absolute support of my academic father, Robert L. Fiore, and of my beloved Amy Williamsen at my alma mater, the University of Arizona. I also want to thank my families in Spain and in Michigan and, most importantly, my husband, Chad, for championing my work and for his words of reassurance and motivation when I needed them most. I am eternally indebted to him. Last but not least, to my two daughters, Sofia and Victoria, for all the times that you rightfully asked me, "When will the book be done?" it is all yours now, mis niñas.
