

Acknowledgements

When a book takes over a decade to complete, you amass a long list of debts of gratitude. Looking over the list of people in these acknowledgements is a reminder that it has been time well spent. First and foremost, I am thankful for the people who shared their knowledge with me and made this book possible. Thank you for your openness in providing a glimpse into your world so that we may all better understand ours.

So many Northern friends provided the support and insight that were essential to the research: Connie Belanger, Trisha Rhymes, Lisa Ruggles, Sophie Call, Ken and Vicky Latour, Kevin Wallington, and Patrick Poisson. Merci aux étudiants et enseignants à l'École Boréale qui m'accueille chaque fois que j'arrive dans le Nord. Ginger Gibson and Stephanie Irlbacher-Fox helped me to find my professional bearings at the start of my process.

The research for this book began in my doctoral program at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) University of Toronto. My supervisor, Monica Heller, is to thank for many of the skills needed to research like a grown-up. She was a generous mentor who set up the conditions in which her students could thrive. Mireille McLaughlin and Emmanuel DeSilva were my officemates and best interlocutors for sorting through ideas in those initial stages of study. My intellectual and political growth came from provocations from committee members Elizabeth Povinelli and Bonnie McElhinny. What a privilege it was to have your thoughts on my work. The Anthropology Department at the University of Toronto took me in as an intellectual refugee and for that I am forever grateful. Cohort mates Chantal Falconer, Aaron Kappeler, Sharon Kelly, Zoe Wool, Laura Sikstrom, Jessica Taylor, Kori Allan, and Olga Federenko made things lighter through shared struggles.

I was fortunate to have three resident fellowships that supported this work. First was a summer fellowship at the School for Advanced Research in Santa Fe, where it felt as if my cohort had been hand-picked for me to have the most engaging conversations. Hannah Voorhees, Gretchen Purser, and Mindy Morgan made that summer a highlight of this academic life. Next, Blue Mountain Centre offered me sustained time to work alongside Genevieve Scott, long-time friend and writer par excellence. She has been my go-to for advice and solidarity for well over ten years. If only we were neighbours all the time! Finally, Sari Pietikäinen invited me to be a “Language in a Changing Society” research fellow at the University of Jyväskylä, Finland, in 2016 and has been an incredible mentor ever since. She has read many drafts and heard long laments about this book. I am so very grateful. Kiitos!

There is a handful of scholars who love talking Northern stuff as much as I do. I am lucky to have Joshua Moses, Julia Christensen, and Sara Komarnisky as both friends and colleagues. Kirk Dombrowski’s book on culture politics in Alaska allowed me to do the kind of thinking I was longing for. He also taught me the value of “taking the crayons away.”

Andrew Walsh, Elizabeth Ferry, and Annabel Vallard kindly invited me to participate in a Wenner-Gren workshop on the anthropology of precious minerals. There I met Filipe Calvao and Brian Brazeal, who taught me a lot about the workings of gem mining in other parts of the world.

I recruited professional help when I needed it most. Anne Amienne, writing coach and skills builder, you are to thank for turning my career around. I wish I had only known sooner that support was possible. Struggling writers reading this need to know that it is okay to ask for help. I had to learn that others were getting support by simply being more privileged.

I presented this material at Johns Hopkins University, Hamilton College, and Harvard University, where thought-provoking conversations with faculty and students changed the course of the book for the better. Tom Ozden Schilling, your kindness and commitment to my work feels undeserved. Bonnie Urciuoli and Chaise LaDousa provided an intellectual home away from home while in upstate New York.

Sandra Rosenthal provided compassion and support on every front. She invited me to participate in a writing group that got this book across the finish line. The generosity of Risa Cromer, Ken MacLeish, Carlota MacAllister, and Emily Yates-Doerr cannot be understated. Their own writing modelled so much of what I think is good in anthropology. Greg Beckett generously ran an online writing support group that helped troubleshoot any sticky points in the process. Thank you to the supportive members who provided insight and motivation to finish.

Thank you to the eager undergraduate assistants I've had over the years: Beth Coley, Victoria Ostrovsky, and Howard Boutelle. It has been fun to watch you soar. The talented Zoe Barriault led a student focus group so that I could get feedback from my target audience. The astute reading by Jessie Howard, Vanessa Ritsema, Alexandra Cini, Celine Tsang, and Josephine Bywaters showed me that sticking to the story is always the best plan. Madelyn Hertz, a talented PhD student, worked with me in the final hours of editing.

The art for the book, including the cover, came from my collaboration with Jesse Colin Jackson. In a strange instance of stars aligning, I found the one artist researcher who liked to talk about postwar towers as much as I do. Thank you for the parallel play that continues to be generative in how I think about the politics of representation and academic currency exchange.

Alana Ossa was a wonderful colleague at Oswego State who kept my spirits up. I have the pleasure of now calling Western's Anthropology Department home. My colleagues' kindness and support have meant the world to me. Kim Clark, Karen Pennesi, Dan Jorgensen, and Lisa Hodgetts are owed special thanks for their guidance. Ed Eastaugh made the maps for this book after a casual mention that I was in need.

Several friendships were particularly central to this work. Denielle Elliott is an inspiring anthropologist and comrade who makes me feel freer to write honestly. Khadija Coxon has heard about this work for way too long and taught me the value of organized thoughts and being straightforward. Tessa Murphy and Dipankar Rai kept me afloat during two maternity leaves and a pandemic. There are not enough ways to thank you both for the warmth you extend to me and my family. The GBC girls, you know what you mean to me.

My family has supported me in more ways than I can count. My mother did a lot of laundry in the hopes that this book might actually be done at one point. My siblings, Adam and Ashton, baba Luba, my dad, and Claire were all eager to see this come to fruition. Thank you!

Selections from chapter 3 ("Race") were initially published in the edited 2012 collection 21st Century Migration: Ethnography and Political Economy, edited by Winnie Lem and Pauline Gardiner-Barber (Bell 2012). I am extremely grateful to both editors for their feedback on the many iterations of this piece. Some of the material in chapter 6 ("Morality") appears in my article "Soft Skills, Hard Rocks: Making Diamonds Ethical in Canada's Northwest Territories," published in 2017 in Focaal: Journal of Global and Historical Anthropology. Again, the reviewers and editors helped improve this piece and are owed thanks.

A conversation with Anne Brackenbury many years ago stayed with me and pulled me back to working with University of Toronto Press. By that time, she had moved on to bigger and better things, but her vision for this series guided me nonetheless. Carli Hansen received my manuscript warmly and helped sharpen it substantially. She gave me the deadlines I needed. No pressure, no diamond. Thank you to the anonymous reviewers for their comments. I could have done without Reviewer Two's tone, but I will say their close reading did the most to improve the work.

To my husband, David, and our children, Harrison Abijah and Stephanie Ulla, thank you for being my reason for wrapping this up so that we can spend more time together. I love you so much. You are my sacred and mundane.
