

Acknowledgments

Over the enormous time that it takes to make a book, authors and editors incur many debts. Our first thanks go to Daniel Quinlan of the University of Toronto Press. He responded to our book proposal with the enthusiasm that all writers hope to hear. The process of transforming the manuscript to a book occupied many others at UTP, particularly Antonia Pop, vice president for publications; Ryan Pidhayny, production coordinator; and Simon Coll, who carefully copyedited these widely differing texts. Cheryl Lemmens expertly prepared the index. We are grateful to them all.

Carleton University's Faculty of Public and Global Affairs and Toronto Metropolitan University's Faculty of Arts provided essential funding that helped defray some of the publication costs. We are also grateful for the support of the Assistance to Scholarly Publications Program of the Federation for the Humanities and Social Sciences and to the Institute of Public Administration of Canada. The project's genesis can be found in a grant to Stephen Azzi from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada for a project on prime ministerial leadership in Canada.

Our contributors, an impressive group of experts on prime ministers and cabinet governance, generously contributed their research and insights. They delighted us by submitting work on time, responding quickly to queries, and sharing our excitement for this project. It is said that editors of academic collections make many enemies. We count ourselves lucky to have assembled twenty-one scholars who were a joy to work with right to the end. We strengthened old friendships and made new ones along the way.

Not least, we are grateful to our spouses, Adriana Gouvêa and Maha Dutil, who remained unwavering in their support as the book ate up more and more of our time.

We dedicate this volume to our students, those individuals who sign up for our courses, who are the first to hear our theories and who give us feedback on our approaches. Their eager quest for knowledge has kept us motivated to create and complete this work. We hope they are aware of the important place they have on the reflections of all of us who have contributed to this book.

Stephen Azzi and Patrice Dutil
17 December 2024

This page intentionally left blank