

Acknowledgments

Several people spent a great deal of their own time on this book. The contribution of the individual authors is obvious, but much of the development and final shape of the book is due to others. It was Ian Lumsden who originally suggested I submit a proposal to the ULSR, and from that point, he was consistently encouraging in this undertaking. In all truth, this book would not exist had it not been for him. Mel Watkins also helped greatly in the first stages and made valuable criticisms of several papers throughout the many months it took to collect and edit them. Danny Drache was encouraging and helpful from the beginning. Jack Warnock, Greg Kealey, and Marvin Ross read several of the papers and provided useful comments. Diana and Larry MacDonald gave of their time in the early stages. Much of the typing and re-typing was done by Michaela Faust, who made the University of Toronto an institution helpful to this project. Christine Purden did much of the style editing; her evaluations of the articles were particularly important in making some of the larger decisions. I thank Tom Naylor, whose importance to the book is obvious, for providing some needed wit during the last months of preparation. To Rik Davidson, thanks for the best of advice and assistance and for speeding the book through the press.

Madalen, my wife, contributed much in the criticizing and editing of several papers. Her support and involvement from the beginning were central to the making of this book.
