Kenneth Kronenberg is a German translator specializing in 19th- and 20th-century letters and diaries, and Holocaust-related material, including some 450 letters written between Constantinople and Germany (1884-1888) and 30 letter-length responses to a questionnaire by German officers who fought under Blücher at Waterloo.

He keeps body and soul together by translating medical and biotech patents and other such material, and in his free time he cultivates the art of befriending long-forgotten writers and attempting to rescue them from oblivion.

His publications include Lives and Letters of an Immigrant Family: The Van Drevelts' Experiences along the Missouri, 1844-1866. University of Nebraska Press, 1998 (author/translator); Karl Heinz Brisch. Treating Attachment Disorders. New York: Guilford Press, 2002; Vilém Flusser. Freedom of the Migrant (Anke Finger, ed.). University of Illinois Press, 2003; and Alice Ehrmann. "Terezín ghetto diary." In Alexandra Zapruder, Salvaged Pages: Young Writers' Diaries of the Holocaust. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2002.

Kenneth Kronenberg lives in Cambridge, Massachusetts.
