Summer delights the scholar
With knowledge and reason.
Who is happy in hedgerow
Or meadow as he is?

—Austin Clarke (1896–1974), “The Scholar”

The road to Lara could not have been more delightful. For this, I first thank Thomas Bisson, whose graduate seminar opened my eyes to the possibilities of medieval Spain, and whose guidance has been invaluable at every step. To Charles Donahue of Harvard Law School I express my warmest appreciation; his generosity in time and attention went far beyond the bounds of necessity. Two grants from the Department of History at Harvard and the Real Colegio Complutense made possible my first summer of research in the hedgerows, meadows, and archives of Spain. Subsequent research was financed in part by the Program for Cultural Cooperation between Spain’s Ministry of Culture and United States’ Universities, and I could not have completed the project without the support of Dean Bernard Firestone and the Hofstra College of Liberal Arts and Sciences.

I am immensely indebted to Simon Barton, as much for his friendly suggestions and criticisms as for his pioneering scholarship; without him, there would have been many more errors of fact and identification. In Madrid, Reyna Pastor, Carlos Estepa Díez, and Isabel Alfonso Antón of the Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas welcomed me with an enthusiasm I will never forget; their expertise, at a critical juncture in my research, was indispensable. Cristina Jular

Pérez-Alfaro has been an endless source of advice, assistance, and good humor, and Julio Escalona Monge is one of very few people to share my absorption in the history of the Lara family. Ana Rodríguez López, José Antonio Jara Fuente, and Ignacio Álvarez Borge have all been extraordinarily helpful, while Carmen Alonso was unstinting in her thirteenth-hour efforts to track down dusty tomes and recent articles. The excellent cartographic work was completed by Marco Antonio Río Otero, of the University of Santiago de Compostela. At Harvard University Press, Elizabeth Suttell expertly guided this book through the early stages of publication, while Maria Ascher's editorial comments were quite brilliant. Without their support and guidance, it would have been much harder to evoke "the stone plain where the saints live"—the summer paradise of Austin Clarke's scholar. Yet some things on this plain, like the castle on the ridge at Lara, are still hard to make out, and many aspects of medieval Spain remain elusive. My greatest debt lies with all those friends and family members who have transmitted their passion for losing and finding oneself in a world which, in the end, can only be imagined.
