
Acknowledgments

It is a pleasure to thank the institutions that have made this book possible, and even more the many people who have made it better than it otherwise would have been.

I am most grateful to Anthony Grafton and Theodore Rabb, under whose guidance the thesis behind the book took shape at Princeton University. In addition—and heroically—Tony offered his typically meticulous scrutiny of every sentence and footnote in the book manuscript. For his willingness to pore over certain passages in half a dozen versions, I am deeply indebted to him. I thank Peter Brown, ever an inspiration and supporter; an offhand comment of his about Ramon Lull sparked the idea for this project in the spring of 1991. I extend my thanks to others from my time at Princeton, many of them now elsewhere, who offered advice and criticism: Alastair Bellany, Hilary Bernstein, Betsy Brown, Cynthia Cupples, Peter Lake, Louis Miller, April Shelford, Ben Weiss, and John Wilson. Robert Kingdon graciously served as the outside reader of the dissertation. As a Junior Fellow in the Harvard Society of Fellows, I received further input in various ways from Daniel Aron, Bernard Bailyn, Herbert Bloch, Géraldine Johnson, Robert Kendrick, Sarah McNamer, Robert Nozick, and Christine Thomas. Steve Ozment welcomed me to Cambridge and read the thesis for the press, offering astute suggestions, as did William Monter, the other reader for the press. My gratitude to both of them. I thank as well Caroline Walker Bynum, John O'Malley, and Arnold Snyder, who carefully read chapters and shared knowledge of their respective specialties while offering bibliographic leads. Since arriving at Stanford, I have been blessed with wonderful colleagues, faculty and graduate students alike, who have also offered suggestions: I am indebted to Paula Findlen, Laurie Koloski, Steve Schloesser, Brent Sockness, and Steve Zipperstein. Jim Sheehan deserves particular thanks for reading the full thesis plus parts of the book, and for his unfailingly good advice. Philippe Buc scrutinized the entire book manuscript with extraordinary care and offered many valuable suggestions. My gratitude as well to Tom Brady for his detailed comments on the introduction.

In the United States, the following institutions and organizations have facilitated my research, for which I render thanks: the University Center for Human Values at Princeton; the staffs of Firestone and Marquand Libraries, Princeton; Speer Library, Princeton Theological Seminary; Widener and Houghton Libraries, Harvard; Green Library, Stanford; and the Mennonite Historical Library, Goshen College, Indiana, where John Roth, Joe Springer, and Janet Shoemaker were all extremely helpful. From 1994 to 1996, the Harvard Society of Fellows provided a working environment that was a young scholar's dream come true. I would also like to thank the Board of Syndics of the Harvard University Press for awarding this book its annual Thomas J. Wilson Prize, and Donna Bouvier, also of the press, for her meticulous copyediting.

I appreciate the financial support provided by the Joint Committee on Western Europe of the American Council of Learned Societies and the Social Science Research Council with the aid of the Ford and Mellon Foundations. The SSRC made possible a year of research in England, Belgium, and the Netherlands in 1992–1993. The generosity of David and Karen Kratter to the Stanford history department funded another research trip in 1997. I am grateful to the staffs of the following libraries and archives for their assistance during my research abroad, particularly to the individuals mentioned by name: the British Library, London; Ian Dickie of the Archive of the Archbishops of Westminster, London; D. J. Wright of the Library of the Huguenot Society, University College, London; the Universiteitsbibliotheek, Amsterdam; Koninklijke Bibliotheek and Algemeen Rijksarchief, The Hague; Bibliotheek der Rijksuniversiteit, Leiden; Bibliotheek der Rijksuniversiteit, Utrecht; Stadsarchief, Antwerp; Koninklijke Bibliotheek and Algemeen Rijksarchief, Brussels; Rijksarchief and Stadsarchief, Bruges; Rijksarchief, Stadsarchief, and Bibliotheek van de Universiteit, Ghent, including Albert Derolez, Theo Van Poucke, and Roland De Groote. To Piet Visser of the University of Amsterdam I express particular gratitude for his hospitality. I also thank Paul Valkema Blouw for sharing his unparalleled knowledge of sixteenth-century Dutch printing.

Among those who have contributed most to my intellectual formation, I owe an enormous debt to Heiko Oberman, who has unstintingly supported my work ever since I had the privilege of participating in his graduate seminar for two years. Without his insistence that one distinguish understanding from evaluation in doing history, my approach to early modern Christianity would never have taken shape. Thanks also to my close friend John Steffen, a philosopher whose analytical brilliance enabled him to see more clearly than I the full implications of my approach to the history of religion. His penetrating attention to both the thesis and the book manuscript is deeply appreciated.

To my undergraduate mentor, Len Rosenband, I owe more than can be appropriately expressed here. His passion for the past—wedded to deep learning and shared in the classroom—inspired me to become a historian. Whatever skill I have as a writer stems from his influence. Far transcending what any student could ever expect or dare hope for, he has offered constant support, advice, and intellectual companionship over more than a decade.

To my family I am most indebted. My parents, Eugene and Mary Lou Schaefer, have constantly backed me in everything I have ever done—never imagining, I am sure, that the son to whom they gave the middle name “Stephan” would one day write about Christian martyrdom. Likewise, no one could hope for better parents-in-law than mine: Ken and Linda McCaw, and Frederick and Barbara Hecht, tireless in their support and love. The two people to whom I owe the most are my wife, Kerrie McCaw, and our son, Sean McCaw-Gregory. Infinitely patient, always understanding, repeatedly making sacrifices for me, they have made this book possible, enduring all along my obsessive single-mindedness. Better than anyone else, they understand my calling. Fittingly, this book is dedicated to them.
