The joy of writing history is being part of a collective project, and I am grateful to have had colleagues, family, and friends who tenderly supported this endeavor. Geoff Eley and Kathleen Canning advised me steadily through its revisions. Giving me encouragement at the University of Michigan were also Scott Spector, H. D. Cameron, Daniel Saferstein, Holde Borcherts, and Sonya Rose. Jeffrey Wilson remained a most loyal friend and intellectual companion while he extended his encyclopedic knowledge of German history. Ian McNeely, Katherine Pence, Ellen Willow, Jordan Shapiro, Jeffrey Rothstein, Andy Evans, Mia Lee, and Mary Wheeler challenged me to take my subject but not myself seriously. My arguments were cultivated by colleagues in seminars and writing groups: Robin Judd, Timothy Kaiser, Edward Mathieu, Julie Stubbs, Isaac Land, K. O. Chong, and Amanda Bailey at the University of Michigan; Timothy McMahon, Mary Conley, Sean Field, Alan Singer, Barbara Fox, Jim Marten, and Rebecca Wittmann at Marquette University; and Brian Bunk, José Hernández, Tobias Nagl, Maureen Gallagher, Chris Appy, and Catherine Epstein in the Five-College Faculty Seminar in History in Amherst, Massachusetts. My interpretations were also helped by colleagues who reviewed sections of this book at various stages: Reinhard Rürup, Jürgen Kocka, Dirk Schumann, Bradley Naranch, Frank Trommler, Stefan Goebel, James Albisetti, Maureen Healy, Bryan Ganaway, Till van Rhaden, Harold Ross, Charles Maier, Ute Frevert, M. J. Maynes, Belinda Davis, Ari Sammartino, Ann Taylor Allen, Christina Benninghaus, and the reviewer for Harvard University Press. A long and thoughtful commentary by an anonymous reviewer at the Journal of Modern History fundamentally changed how I thought about youth in the First World War. I am especially indebted to both Derek Linton, who generously read the entire manuscript, and the anonymous reviewer for the Harvard Historical Studies for their sharp criticisms and suggestions that led to the final structure of this book. My colleagues in German and Scandinavian Studies and the Department of History at the University of Massachusetts Amherst created a supportive and inspiring environment, more wonderful than I ever expected.

Sections of this book were first published in the following articles and appear with the permission of the publishers: "Why Did German Youth Become Fascists? Nationalist Males Born 1900 to 1908 in War and Revolution," Social History 31 (2006): 337–358 (<http://www.informaworld.com>); "Models for Young Nationalists and Militarists: Youth Literature in the First World War," German Studies Review 27 (2004): 575–594; and "From War Pedagogy to Reform Pedagogy: Education and Youth Reform before 1914 and the Mobilization for War in Germany," in Raising Citizens in the "Century of the Child": Child-Rearing and Education in the United States and Central Europe in the Twentieth Century, ed. Dirk Schumann (New York: Berghahn Books, forthcoming).

I was fortunate to receive financial support from the German Academic Exchange Service (DAAD), the Spencer Foundation, the Mellon Foundation, the Centre de Recherche of the Historial de la Grande Guerre, the College of Humanities and Fine Arts at the University of Massachusetts Amherst, and the Department of History and the Rackham School of Graduate Studies at the University of Michigan (Ann Arbor).

Above all, I wish to thank my family—Erin, Nicole, Emma, Oliver, Marvel, Keith, Carol, Jon, my mother, my father, and, in memoriam, Bill—for their unconditional support. Among other things, my father taught me to value clarity and omit needless words; my mother, the schoolteacher extraordinaire, gave me her pedagogical wisdom. Nicole extended her generous heart, and her good humor made me laugh and see the positive even when things were the worst. Erin patiently answered my questions on style, and her eyes brightened and filled me with joy whenever I talked about this book. When she wasn't there, thoughts of her made me smile and get back to work.

YOUTH IN THE FATHERLESS LAND
