

Acknowledgments

INSTITUTIONS CONTRIBUTED quite a lot to the writing of this book, and I am pleased to acknowledge their support and that of the people associated with them. This book began at Columbia University, and many years later I am still benefiting from the advice of David Armitage and Isser Woloch. The Institut National D'Etudes Démographiques (INED) in Paris funded several research trips, and Loïc Charles and Christine Théré have been unstintingly generous colleagues during my visits there. The Queen's University of Belfast provided research funds, and there I would like to thank David Hayton in particular. At the University of Chicago, the Department of History, the Division of the Social Sciences, and the Franke Institute for the Humanities have each supported my research and writing in indispensable ways. Colleagues here providing valuable criticism and support included Fredrik Albritton-Jonsson, Bruce Cummings, Jan Goldstein, Robert Morrissey, and Emily Osborn. Bill Sewell offered particularly detailed, useful comments on the manuscript.

Conferences and seminars provided the occasion for the airing of ideas, some of which proved especially stimulating. In this connection, I would like to thank Bernard Bailyn at Harvard University; Keith Baker at Stanford University; Allan Macinnes and Steve Pincus, who organized a seminar at the Newberry Library; Gabriel Paquette of Cambridge University; the Political Theory Workshop at the University of Chicago, with thanks to Sankar Muthu and Jennifer Pitts; and finally the Probability Seminar at Columbia University, with particular thanks to Eric Wakin. In addition, Hank Clark and Ran Halévi organized Liberty Fund conferences that were the occasion for fruitful, sometimes heated discussion of authors discussed in this book. Many colleagues not named here responded to my work in various ways, and I thank them all.

Antoine and Bénédicte Piron were kind enough to host a perfect stranger making a research visit to Nantes; I am grateful for their hospitality.

I would like to thank the editors of William and Mary Quarterly, Historical Reflections, and Dix-huitième siècle for their permission to incorporate material from my previously published articles, as follows:

Portions of Chapter 3 (pp. 110–116) are reprinted by permission from “A False Dawn for Enlightenment Cosmopolitanism? Franco-American Trade during the American War of Independence,” William and Mary Quarterly 63, no. 3 (July 2006), pp. 459–484.

Chapter 4 is a slightly revised version of the article “Finances, Philosophical History and the ‘Empire of Climate’: Enlightenment Historiography and Political Economy,” Historical Reflections 31, no. 1 (2005), pp. 141–167. Reprinted by permission.

Portions of Chapter 5 (pp. 151–162) are reprinted by permission from “Les économistes français et l’image de l’Amérique: l’essor du commerce transatlantique et l’effondrement du ‘gouvernement féodal,’” Dix-huitième siècle 33 (2001), pp. 229–243.

Many authors’ acknowledgments proclaim the essentially social nature of scholarship, whereas for me it seems a solitary business. I am all the more appreciative, therefore, to have benefited from the encouragement, criticism, and fellowship of Jeff Collins, Joe Green, Tamara Griggs, Edwige Kacenelenbogen, Julia Kindt, Paul Lakosky, Catherine Larrère, Ben Lazier, Allan Potofsky, and Melvin Richter.

My household and its members were in perpetual motion for several years as I made research trips in connection with this book, and we relocated to Northern Ireland so that I could take up an academic post there. During this period, we built up a stock of cherished memories, particularly from a place called the Bloody Foreland, and my seven-year-old son Nicholas now has a dog-eared passport to show for his peregrinations. But prolonged absences on my part and two transatlantic house moves were often less than amusing for my wife Jessie, who kept things together under sometimes strained circumstances. This book is dedicated to her in deepest gratitude for her forbearance, her loyalty, and her sustaining love.
