

Acknowledgments

---

I owe an enormous debt to Reginald Foster, who first taught me the endless joy and wisdom of Latin literature. The three years and four summers I studied with him were the foundation for everything I have done since. I can't read Latin without hearing his voice reminding me of its intricate complexities. I also wish to thank my teachers at Trinity College Dublin, and John Dillon in particular, who taught me Greek literature and philosophy. My adventures in the Renaissance first began in the summer of 1988, when I met Ken Gouwens in Reginald's Latin summer school. Three years later Ken introduced me to Ron Witt, who converted me from Classics to the Classical tradition and the Italian Renaissance. Both Ken and Ron encouraged me to do graduate work in the Renaissance and have been very supportive over the years.

This book started as a dissertation at Harvard University in Fall 1996. I wish to thank my academic advisor, Jim Hankins, who suggested I look into this topic. He initiated me into the mysteries of Renaissance paleography and inspired me with his combination of breadth and intellectual rigor. Jim has also been a wonderful friend. Steven Ozment introduced me to social history and changed my whole way of thinking about history. John O'Malley has been an inspiration to me in his openness and willingness to deal with controversial subjects. His breadth of knowledge and critical eye much improved the dissertation and my thinking in general. The late John Shearman not only taught me a great deal and employed me, but also allowed me to stay in his house the last three summers, so I could do research in the Harvard libraries.

A Fulbright grant allowed me to conduct research in Italy, and a Frances A. Yates fellowship helped me to explore the resources of the British Library and the Warburg. At the Warburg, Jill Krave was extremely generous with her time. A finishing grant from Harvard University and an ARC grant from Queen's University allowed me to finish the dissertation and to revise it for publication. Ann Blair, Paul Grendler, Margaret King, and Ron Witt read drafts of this book and generously offered detailed criticism. Paul in particular gave me twelve pages of comments. Chris Celenza, Ken Gouwens, John Monfasani, and the anonymous readers for The Sixteenth Century Journal and the Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte provided invaluable suggestions on particular parts that have helped to improve the entire book. The staffs of the following libraries made my research both possible and enjoyable: in Florence, the Biblioteca Mediceo-Laurenziana, the Biblioteca Nazionale Centrale, and the Biblioteca Riccardiana; in London, the British Library; in Milan, the Biblioteca Ambrosiana and the Biblioteca Trivulziana; in Paris, the Bibliothèque Nationale; in Rome, the Biblioteca Casanatense, the Biblioteca Corsiniana, the Biblioteca Nazionale Centrale Vittorio Emanuele, and the Biblioteca Vallicelliana; in Vatican City, the Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana; in Venice, the Museo Civico Correr and the Biblioteca Nazionale Marciana; and in Vienna, the Österreichische Nationalbibliothek.

Emily O'Brien, Margaret Meserve, Robert Goulding, Nadja Aksamija, Cindy Klestinec, Frederick Ilchmann, and Filippo de Vivo have all been great friends. I appreciate that we all work in related fields and can share ideas. At Queen's, my colleagues have been most supportive, especially our dear friends, Jeanette, Chris, Laurence, and Murley Herrle-Fanning. They have made the long cold Canadian winters a little easier to bear. I promise I'll make more pizza.

My father, a historian, and my mother, an English teacher and librarian, first introduced me to European culture and history. I will always be grateful for the many worlds that they showed me. Max, our dog, has been a constant companion. His keen eye for detail, acute canine intelligence, and rigorous approach to logic especially contributed to the argumentative structure of the book. Lastly, I would like to thank my wife, Una Roman D'Elia, who has not only provided invaluable assistance by reading drafts and recommending revisions, but has also been the constant inspiration for this project. Quid dicam quod iocundius quoque voluptarius sit marito cum se mulieri coniunctum sentit?

While checking the page proofs for this book, our daughter Lucia was born: O matre pulchra filia pulchrior (Horace, Carm. I, 16).