
Acknowledgments

It is a great pleasure finally to thank the many people whose generosity and support have sustained this endeavor. I should first like to express my deepest appreciation to two people of tremendous intellectual and personal importance in my life, Patrice Higonnet and Dominique Veillon, not only fabulous scholars but also incredible human beings. In the field of juvenile delinquency, both Jacques Bourquin and Michel Chauvière generously shared their time, expertise, and even materials with an American they barely knew. Undertaking the archival work for this book required figuring out which archives to check for documents. For her indispensable help directing me to all the right places, thanks to Chantal de Tourtier-Bonazzi, retired director of the Section contemporaine of the Archives nationales. Thanks also to her equally helpful, knowledgeable, and kind successor, Paule René-Bazin; to Alain Erlande-Brandenburg, director of the Archives nationales for help with permissions; and to the provincial archival directors who helped me gain access to their holdings, Claudine Wallart at the Archives départementales du Nord, Florence Beaume at the Archives d'Indre-et-Loire, and Lise Carretero at the Archives départementales du Gard. The Archives départementales de Paris proved indispensable to this study; my heartfelt thanks to the director, Jean-Marie Jenn, as well as to archivists Philippe Grand and Roger Cousin from the ADP's annex at Villemoison. Most especially I must thank Brigitte Lainé, a remarkable archivist who has courageously insisted on archival access and honesty about France's past. I should also like to thank Mademoiselle Poinssotte at the Public Assistance Archives in Paris, and Françoise Bosman and Madame Etienne-Magnien at the archives of the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs. Jeanne Decker, attachée du directeur at the Association Olga Spitzer (formerly the Service social de l'enfance) not only made available the association's holdings from the era but also was instrumental in helping me find a publisher for a French version of my first book on prisoner-of-war wives, so I thank her for her help in both areas. As a result of a happy accident, Georges d'Heucqueville kindly agreed to an interview about his wartime activities in the field. In August 1991, the person who delivered his book to my table at the Bibliothèque nationale mentioned that the author was his father, then telephoned him to arrange the meeting. Jean Donnedieu de Vabres was kind enough to share his own experiences as well as those of his late father, the renowned jurist Henri Donnedieu de Vabres. Catherine Cléré at La Documentation française helped me locate relevant photographs.

For most excellent, thought provoking, and always welcome suggestions, thanks to Robert Zaretsky, Bailey Stone, Karl Ittmann, Kathleen Nilan, Richard Blackett, Pamela Cox, Kenneth Mouré, and Martin Alexander. Thanks to Sharif Gemie and Barry Bergen for essential information about schooling; to Brett Bowles for help with Vichy's Hollywood policies; to Alain Bancaud for information about judges; to Simon Kitson for information about the police; to Claudine Giacchetti, Roger Wiesenbach, and Irene Rosenberg for help understanding legal issues; to Charles Closman and Paulette Hernandez for help with translations. For more general intellectual and moral support, I should like to acknowledge Irene Guenther, Tom O'Brien, Miranda Pollard, Paula Schwartz, Geneviève Dermenjian, Bert Gordon, Dan Sherman, Yves Durand, Philippe Burrin, John Sweets, Richard Jobs, and my partners in the Gang of Four: Leonard V. Smith, Laura Lee Downs, and Ioannis Sinanoglou. I have benefited, as have so many, from the towering intellectual influence of Robert Paxton, Stanley Hoffmann, Henri Rousso, and Rod Kedward. For an incredible job correcting factual errors, my thanks to Bernard Sinsheimer, and to Julie Ericksen Hagen for her respectful and precise editing. The University of Houston Research Council, College of Liberal Arts and Social Sciences, and History Department have provided both grants and leaves of absence that made possible the research and writing of this book. I should like especially to express my gratitude to my colleague Joe Pratt, who generously funded departmental leaves of absence that benefited me and other colleagues. At Harvard University Press, thanks to Elizabeth Suttell and Kathleen McDermott.

This book required many trips to France and quite a bit of travel while there. For their kind hospitality, thanks to Florence Perronin, Isabelle and Christophe Alasseur, Alain and Germaine LeCoufle, Thierry Zabal, Edith Giacchetti, Kay and Jean-Marie Panterne, Laurence Doubinsky, Jacques-line and Philippe Lebert, and Annette Becker. Thanks to Katy and, especially, Alex for putting up with my absences. And of course without someone willing to take over full-time household and child-care duties, I could never have made those trips. I can hardly express the depth of my gratitude, for everything that he does, to my husband, Andy Boyd.

Some material in Chapters 1, 3, 4, and 6 appears in different versions and is reprinted with permission. “Juvenile Delinquency as a ‘Condition’: Social Science Constructions of the Child Criminal, 1936–1946,” Western Society for French History, Proceedings 24 (1997): 92–100; copyright 1997. “Youth in Vichy France: The Juvenile Crime Wave and Its Implications,” in Sarah Fishman et al., eds., France at War: Vichy and the Historians, copyright 2000 by Berg Publishers. “Crisis and Change in the Juvenile Justice System, 1934–1945,” in Kenneth Mouré and Martin S. Alexander, eds., Crisis and Renewal in Twentieth-Century France, copyright 2002 by Berghahn Books. “Absent Fathers and Family Breakdown: Delinquency in Vichy France,” in Pamela Cox and Heather Shore, eds., Becoming Delinquent: British and European Youth, 1650–1950, copyright 2002 by Ashgate Publishing.

