Many months over many years were spent researching the rich collections of pamphlets, newspapers, manuscripts, and illustrations in the Bibliothèque Nationale (now the Bibliothèque Nationale de France) as well as varied document collections in the Salle des Manuscrits; many librarians and library assistants (guardians) offered help in finding materials, transporting them, and permitting me to read fragile works (before many became accessible only in microform). I want to express my gratitude to all of them. More recently the staff of the Salle des Microfilms of the Archives Nationales gained my enduring appreciation for their help, kindness, and friendliness in navigating among the documents and around the difficult working conditions of C.A.R.A.N.; in particular my deep thanks to Gildas Charmel and Fredy Sapotille. The extensive pamphlet collection of the British Library that I briefly touched is one I recommend to scholars. Columbia University's Seligman collection of pamphlets is another rich source that merits greater familiarity and use.

In the early years of research I was fortunate to have the direct tactile experience of working with original sources, now a rarity as microfiches and microfilms increasingly replace the actual books and documents.

Financial assistance for my research in France was provided over the years by the American Council of Learned Societies, the Fulbright Travel Grant program, the National Endowment for the Humanities Travel to Collections Grant, many research grants awarded by the Professional Staff Congress-City University of New York (PSC-CUNY, an institution whose beneficence I deeply appreciate), and the History Department of Queens College (CUNY) in which I taught. To those institutions, and to the several chairmen of the History Department, in particular Professor Frank Warren,

I express my gratitude. Some chapters included in this book are revised versions of earlier journal articles; for details, see the headnotes to the note sections at the back of book.

Paris is the meeting place for scholars, not only Americans with their French counterparts, but also Americans with each other. In the hallways of the Bibliothèque Nationale and the Archives Nationales and in nearby cafés I have had conversations on eighteenth-century France that have helped to nurture and clarify ideas and arguments. In particular I want to thank David Bien, Thomas Kaiser, and Dale Van Kley for our many discussions; David has been of inestimable help to me for many years. My friends Annie Duprat, Alice Gérard, and Edna Lemay (now deceased) have engaged with me in countless conversations on eighteenth-century and Revolutionary history and historians, and to them my sincere appreciation for stimulating intellectual exchanges. Thanks also to Alice I was able to visit the village of Crévoux in Dauphiné. Président Valéry Giscard d'Estaing and Mme. Anne Aymon Giscard d'Estaing invited me to their chateau, and with Madame as guide I visited the village of Chanonat; I shall never forget their hospitality and friendliness, and I want to express my deep thanks to them. Harvey Chisick and Peter Jones kindly read and offered valuable comments on the chapter on peasant political consciousness, and George Taylor, Timothy Tackett, and Dominique Julia generously provided bibliographical guidance for that same chapter. Paul Benhamou, Thomas M. Adams, Gilles Feyel, and Jacques Guilhaumou provided me with some of their documentation and knowledge drawn from their research, and for their generosity I want to express my deep gratitude. My sincere appreciation to Lynn Hunt for her counsel, and to Patrice Higonnet for his assistance in the publication of this book. I wish to thank my friends Bruna Bocchini and Pier Giorgio Camaiani, in whose idyllic "La Nocella" I wrote two papers that became two chapters of this book. My husband, Carlo Poni, has read many first drafts of the contents of this book and has given me numerous suggestions for improvements, and my daughter Gabriella has shown much patience and understanding with a mother often busy with research and writing; to both of them goes my deepest appreciation. Barbara Goodhouse has provided helpful assistance in the editing of this book, for which I thank her.
