This book owes much to many. To Thomas Bisson is due the deepest appreciation for his sage counsel at the outset of this project to work with sources I enjoyed reading. His wisdom and characteristic graciousness let me find my own way but kept me from getting lost. Charles Donahue and Jan Ziolkowski both provided generous attention, enthusiasm, and insight in the project's early stages.

Grants from the Fulbright Foundation; the International Dissertation Field Research Fellowship Program of the Social Science Research Council, with funds provided by the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation; and the Pigott Fund of the Maxwell School at Syracuse University, through the generosity of Dean Mitchell Wallerstein, supported the work at various stages. The friendly and helpful staffs at the Bibliothèque nationale and Bibliothèque Sainte-Geneviève in Paris, the Bibliothèque royale/Koninklijke Bibliotheek in Brussels, and the Bibliothèques municipales of Rouen, Arras, Douai, and Chartres aided my investigation. The staffs of the Harvard University libraries, particularly Charles Fineman; John M. Olin Library and its Annex at Cornell; and E. S. Bird Library at Syracuse (especially the indefatigable interlibrary loan department) met odd and innumerable requests with goodwill. Matt Coulter spent many hours assisting me to create the map.

Numerous friends and colleagues enriched this book and the experience of bringing it to fruition. Monique Bourin, as sponsor during my longest stay in France, introduced me to many people, often over delightful meals. Mathieu Arnoux generously shared his knowledge of Norman history and historians. Véronique Gazeau took time from her own research to discuss mine, as did Nancy Gauthier, Monique Goullet, Michel Parisse, Catherine Vincent, Hélène Millet, and Piroska Nagy. Pierre Bauduin put his unpublished work at my disposal. Jacques Le Maho discussed Norman archeology with me at length, as Martin Heinzelmann did the study of hagiography. Joseph-Claude Poulin likewise shared his knowledge of medieval hagiographers, scribes, and hagiographical texts. Anne-Marie Helvétius entered with enthusiasm into the problems of apostolicity and gave generously of her splendid hospitality.

Many on this continent also shared their time and learning. Thomas Head read and discussed portions of my work with keen insight and generous attention. Bernard Bachrach sharpened my knowledge of early Norman Bayeux. Leah Shopkow and Emily Albu discussed Norman history and its medieval chroniclers. Cassandra Potts-Hannahs commented helpfully on an article about Vigor of Bayeux. Michael McCormick shared his extensive knowledge. Annelies Wouters discussed knotty linguistic points. The support of my Syracuse colleagues has been invaluable, especially the generous engagement with this work undertaken by Dennis Romano and Ethan Pollock. To the anonymous readers whose comments improved this book, I am grateful, as I am to Patrice Higonnet, and to Kathleen McDermott and Kathi Drummy of Harvard University Press, who have been accommodating and helpful at every juncture.

This book evolved during my time at Harvard, but in a sense its real inception lies years earlier and an ocean away. A summer's bicycle trip through the soggy but enchanting Norman countryside brought alive the medieval past I had studied as an undergraduate and master's student. Lessons taught by Henry Mayr-Harting, Olivia Remie Constable, Alexander Murray, Peter Cramer, and Malcolm Parkes bloomed in the Norman rain, and these teachers all deserve a special sort of credit for this book. My parents-in-law, James and Virginia Herrick, likewise merit recognition for proposing the bicycle trip. My then-fiancé, Michael, deserves the greatest gratitude of all, for graciously putting up then with the grumbling of a novice camper and reluctant hill-rider, and for graciously putting up ever since with everything else.
