
Acknowledgments

First, I offer much gratitude and owe special thanks to my graduate advisor, Patrice Higonnet, whose generosity, patience, and expertise have been an essential part of this project from the beginning.

I would also like to thank Mark Kishlansky and Donald Fleming for their encouragement. Louis Miller's reading of the manuscript produced many improvements for which I am sincerely grateful. Thanks are also extended to the anonymous readers at Harvard University Press for their suggestions and to my colleagues at Kenyon College, with particular thanks to those who read excerpts from the manuscript, including Fred Baumann, Reed Browning, Tim Spiekerman, and Devin Stauffer. At Harvard University Press, I owe special thanks to Kathleen McDermott. I would also like to express my thanks for the intellectual stimulation and ideas presented by many students, including Jacqueline Newmyer, Elizabeth Oelsner, and especially David Beecher.

Many friends and colleagues have offered very helpful comment, support, and encouragement over several years. Among them are Jon and Michelle Ray, Hugh McNeal, Jeff Collins, Nathan Alexander, Eric and Karen Scheffler, Josh Millet, Amber Carpenter, Christian Illies, Blair Hickey, Mark Strassman, Michael Goldstein, Stephen Kargère, Michaela Giesenkirchen, and many others. I can only offer my thanks and gratitude to all of them. I owe Meghan Donahue thanks for her kindness, courage, and integrity. Julie Newhall's care for the manuscript and its author have been extraordinarily generous, as have her unfailing good humor and companionship.

Many thanks are also given to my brother, Thomas Maguire, and Patty Dempsey for their confidence and encouragement. My parents, Thomas and Beatrice Maguire, have shown deep and steady faith in this project. For this and much else, I dedicate this book to them.

The Conversion of Imagination

