CHAPTER I

TECHNICAL CONDITIONS IN THE TIN INDUSTRY, PAST AND PRESENT . .	i

Nature of tin ore. Stream tinning in early times. Early methods of searching for ore. Forms assumed by the primitive mines. Drainage and other features of mediæval mine economy. Preparation of the ore. Carew's description of the dressing of tin ore. Early smelting furnaces. Advances in mining and smelting in the latter half of the seventeenth century. Preparation of the ore. Use of the steam engine for draining mines. Introduction of blasting. Pit coal smelting. General advance in ore dressing in the eighteenth century. Other improvements. Manner of stoping. The work of the nineteenth century.

CHAPTER II

EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE STANNARIES AND THE TIN TRADE . .	33

Lack of early information with regard to the mines. The Romans and Saxons in the stannaries. The stannaries in the twelfth century. General importance of the industry. Position of the miners. Changes introduced in 1198 by De Wrotham. Charter of 1201. Tinnens freed from manorial service. Increased output of the mines. Revocation of the charter at the instance of the barons. Later confirmation of the charter. The stannaries under the earls of Cornwall. Changes in stannary administration in thirteenth century. Production of tin. Charters of 1305. The stannaries in the fourteenth century. The Black Death. Fluctuations in the output of tin in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The Charter of Pardon. Economic difficulties of the stannaries in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The trade in tin. Shifting of the centre of the tin district from West Devon to West Cornwall. Concentration of the domestic tin trade at the coinage towns. The pewterers of London the ruling factor in the domestic tin trade. Early history of the gild. Its dominant position in the English pewter industry. Export trade in pewter. Foreign competition in the sixteenth century. The pewterers and the tin monopoly. Episode of the Glovers. Favored position of the company under the first Stuarts. Weakened position after the Restoration. Tariffs on tin and pewter. Relations between the pewterers and the tinnens. Foreign trade in tin. Ancient trade routes. Consumption of tin in the Middle Ages. Concentration of tin trade at Marseilles, Cologne, Bruges. Pegolotti's evidence. The Italians and the tin trade. Points of shipment. Tin staples. Gradual concentration of the trade in English vessels in the sixteenth century.

CHAPTER III

EARLY MINING LAW . . . . . 65

Mining among the nations of antiquity. The Roman law of mines. General rule that the ownership of the surface carried with it ownership of the mines. Exceptional cases in Roman mineral law no evidence of the idea of regalian rights in mines. Misinterpretation of Roman mining law by mediæval glossographers. Great influence of these misinterpretations upon mediæval mining law. Theories as to early mining law in Germany. The mines probably at an early date seized by the heads of petty German lordships, who soon, however, turned them over to the workmen. Relations between lords and miners. Mine charters of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Gradual concentration of mining control in the hands of the rulers of the larger territorial divisions. Results of German mineral law, the suppression of the rights of the landowners in favor of the local magnates, and, indirectly, of the miners. Early mineral law in France. Influence of German ideas. Seizure of the mines by the French nobles. Dispossession of the latter by the Crown in 1413. Concessions by Crown to landlords, the dominant note of French mineral policy. Mining monopolies. Mineral law elsewhere. The Belgic Provinces, Scotland, Russia, and Scandinavia. The growth of a specially favored mining class in western Europe. Roving nature of the mediæval miner. Grants of privileges of all sorts made by lords in order to attract skilled miners. English mineral law. Did the English kings attempt to secure regalian rights in mines? English mines from a legal standpoint. Mines of precious metals. Mines the ownership of which went with that of the surface. "Free mining" districts of England. Cornwall and Devon, the Forest of Dean, Alston Moor, the Mendip Hills, Derbyshire. Origin of English mineral law as seen in these districts. Objections to the theory which would make it follow in its development the history of mineral law upon the Continent.

CHAPTER IV

THE STANNARIES AND THE CROWN. ADMINISTRATION AND JUSTICE 85

Separation of the Cornish stannaries from those of Devon. Governmental relations of the stannaries with the Duke of Cornwall. The warden and his duties. Ultimate supremacy of Parliament and the Crown over the stannaries. Tinners' courts. Analogies elsewhere. Origins of the courts. Division of Cornwall and Devon into stannary districts. General jurisdiction of stannary courts. Relations between stannary courts and those of the manor. Conflicts of stannary courts with other jurisdictions. Definition of the word "tinner." The evidence summarized. Local limits of stannary jurisdiction. Jurisdictions of the Duke, warden, and vice-warden, equitable and appellate. Common law courts of the stannaries. Special and customary courts. Ordinary courts of the stewards. Procedure. Jury trials. Manner of pleas. Presentation of tinnerns for criminal offences. The courts leet. Analogies in the manor and craft gild. Judicial and administrative functions of the leet. Stannary parliaments. Possible origin from the leet juries. Composition of the parliaments in Cornwall and in Devon in sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The Charter of Pardon. Procedure in the Cornish Parliament. Was it truly representative of the tinnerns? The "assistants."

CHAPTER V

THE STANNARIES AND THE CROWN. TAXATION AND REVENUE . . . 131

Stannary taxation. Earliest tax. Early mention of the preëmption of tin. Other early sources of revenue. Changes introduced in 1198. Fiscal regulations of De Wrotham. Institution of the King's mark. Changes in fiscal machinery after 1198. Appointment of bailiffs. Development of the warden's duties. Reversion in the thirteenth century to the old policy of farming the stannaries. Fiscal changes in Devon and Cornwall in the thirteenth century. Stannary taxes in 1305 and after. Miscellaneous revenues. Profits of courts. Dublet. Fine of tin. Sale of forfeited tin. Coinage of tin halfpennies and farthings. Tribulage. Black rent. White rent. Preëmption of tin. Its exercise in the fourteenth century. Attitude of the tinnerns. The preëmption under Elizabeth and the Stuarts. Coinage duties. Machinery for collection. Post coinages. Smuggling of tin. Supervisors of blowing-houses. The end of the stannary taxes.

CHAPTER VI

PRIVILEGES AND TRADE RULES OF THE TINNERS . . . . . 157

Patronage given the mining classes by English kings. Privileges of tinnerns. Bounding. Rights of wood and water. Exemption from ordinary taxation. Were the tinnerns liable to impressment? The tinnerns and militia service. Were the tinnerns a gild? Characteristics of the mediæval craft gild. The tinnerns, as opposed to the members of the guilds, enjoyed complete freedom of individual production. Nature of their trade rules. Publicity of work their chief object. The Forest of Dean miners. Approximation of their laws to those of the ordinary craft gild. Exclusiveness of the Dean miners leads eventually to the loss of their privileges.

CHAPTER VII

INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATION IN THE STANNARIES . . . . . 176

Peculiar position of mining in industrial history. Example furnished by the development of the German silver mines. Early rise of the mine partnership formed by workmen who operated the mines under the territorial lords. Tendencies leading to the disintegration of this combination due largely to the growing complexities of mining operations. Stages between the mine partnership and wage work system. The cost agreement. The tribute system. The lease. The coming of wage work in the German mines. Cleavage between capital and labor. Mining conditions in Cornwall as contrasted with those in Germany. Physical contrasts between silver mining and tinning. Absence in Cornwall of seignorial oversight of operations. Traces of early industrial organization in the Cornish mines. Mine partnerships. Evidences of the cost agreement and tribute system. Traces of the early existence of capitalistic enterprise in the mines. Capitalistic organization of English mines as illustrated by royal silver mines of Devon. Probable economic status of the mediæval miner in England. Later developments in the industrial organization of the stannaries. The stannary people in 1586. Carew's account in 1602. Evidence of Jars and Pryce in the eighteenth century. Summary. Tut and tribute systems to-day. The cost book company.

CHAPTER VIII

CAPITAL AND LABOR IN THE STANNARIES . . . . . 208

Relations between miners and middlemen. The smelters in the German mines.

Relations between miners and dealers in France, the Forest of Dean, and Derbyshire. Peculiar situation in the stannaries due to coinage system, and absence of all labor legislation. Early evidences of money advances made by merchants to tinnern. Aggravation of these conditions in the sixteenth century. Forms of "usury" as depicted by Beare, Carew, and others. The condition of the laboring tinner. Deterioration of the standard of living from mediæval times. Remedial measures by the Crown. The preëmption of tin. Its failure to relieve the tinnern. Success of the Cromwellian policy of abolition of preëmption and coinage dues. The reaction under Charles II. Wretched condition of the laboring tinnern at the close of the seventeenth century and later. Development of the smelter as a middleman in place of the London merchant. Present relations between smelters and tinnern.
