THE ORIGINAL INSPIRATION for this study came from Professor Merle Fainsod of Harvard. His calmly considered criticisms and helpful advice steered this analysis away from many a pitfall. Professor Carl J. Friedrich's sharp analytical insights, as well as his knowledge of Nazi Germany, helped the author develop a broader outlook on the problem. Needless to add, neither of them is to be held responsible for the shortcomings of this volume.

The Russian Research Center, and particularly its first director, Professor Clyde Kluckhohn, provided an extremely challenging environment in which ideas and research data were repeatedly subjected to helpful tests of criticism and varying interpretation. Dr. Alex Inkeles and Dr. Barrington Moore Jr. were especially gracious with their time and counsel, and repeatedly emphasized the advantages of an interdisciplinary approach.

Dr. Albert Mavrinac of the Department of Government, Harvard University, deserves a special acknowledgment. He gave freely of his time and effort in reading this manuscript several times. His trenchant observations found considerable reflection in the changes made prior to publication.
