This book can be traced back, through copious revisions and additions, to my doctoral thesis in philosophy at the University of Waterloo, itself in part the product of papers I wrote for various graduate courses. To this end I would like to thank James Van Evra, my thesis supervisor, and the rest of my thesis committee for making the process of writing my thesis as painless as possible. Further, I would like to thank Lorne Dawson and Rick Helmes-Hayes of Waterloo's Sociology Department and Karin MacHardy of Waterloo's History Department for providing a fertile ground in their graduate seminars for papers that eventually found their way into my book. I would also like to thank all my friends and colleagues from my Waterloo days who contributed in a less direct way to the ideas in this book, and Heidi Hochenedel for looking over my Introduction. Lastly, I want to thank the editors of the Critical Review and Clio for allowing me to reprint versions of articles that appeared in their journals: chapter 2 originally appeared as "The Limits of Instrumental Rationality in Social Explanation" in Critical Review 13 (1999), while chapter 4 originally appeared as "Reconstructing the Past, A Structural Idealist Approach" in Clio 27 (1998).
