First ideas for this book evolved during workshops of the German doctoral research programme 'Living in the Transformed Welfare State' (TRANSSOZ), funded by the state of North Rhine-Westphalia between 2013 and 2017. This programme focused on the intersections of social policy and social work. While the participating doctoral students analysed social practices and social outcomes under the conditions of new welfare state paradigms in Western Europe since the 1990s, the 'inverse perspective' of social work as an actor actively shaping the making of social policy was identified as a desideratum for future research.

The project of 'social work and the making of social policy' was further developed during several panel sessions at the annual conferences of the European Network for Social Policy Analysis (ESPAnet) 2016 in Rotterdam, 2017 in Lisbon, as well as 2018 in Vilnius. We are very grateful to all members of the TRANSSOZ doctoral programme and all participants of the respective ESPAnet sessions for their very valuable contributions and comments. In particular, we would like to thank Idit Weiss-Gal and John Gal for their inspiring activities in the research field of policy practice, which have been and continue to be an important role model for us. We are also very grateful to John Gal and Ian Shaw for incorporating us into their book series 'Research in Social Work', and their very helpful advice throughout the editing process. Of course, we would also like to thank most warmly all contributors for presenting their research results, and for their willingness to relate these to the conceptual framework of the policy cycle we suggested for the book.

In addition, such a book requires plenty of work in terms of layout, which was brilliantly taken care of by Monika Spies, Elena Zeidler, Sarah Dickel and Charlotte Nebel. Thanks very much to all of you!

We hope that the contributions in this book will inspire both social work students and academics as well as social work professionals interested in the relationship of social work and social policy.
