As social work academics with an overwhelming interest in social work history, this volume has been an exciting and rewarding project. It has provided us with an opportunity not only to delve into a crucial aspect of the history of the profession, but also to work with excellent scholars from diverse disciplines who have similar interests. The source of most of the chapters in this book is an event organised by the Social Work, History and Research Special Interest Group that we jointly coordinate. The group, which is part of the European Social Work Research Association (ESWRA), held a pre-conference meeting on the Settlement House Movement at the 8th European Conference for Social Work Research in Edinburgh in 2018. The success of the event and quality of the papers presented there encouraged us to compile this volume.

Apart from the chapter authors, who all responded admirably to our requests and deadlines and contributed original and extremely interesting chapters, we are especially grateful to our wonderful editorial assistant, Avi Abood, and to the people at Policy Press who facilitated the publication of the book. In particular, we wish to thank our commissioning editors – Isobel Bainton and Sarah Bird – for their continuing support, and for the editing.

The book is published as part of a series on social work research that is a joint initiative of Policy Press and ESWRA. Our thanks go to the leadership of both organisations and to the past and present editors of the series – Ian Shaw, Anna Gupta and John Gal – for enabling us to bring settlement houses and historical research in social work to the attention of a wide readership.

We hope that the chapters in The Settlement House Movement Revisited: A Transnational History will encourage more scholarly efforts to explore the under-researched, rich and ultimately relevant history of social work.
