

About the editors

Adam Lynes is Senior Lecturer in Criminology at Birmingham City University, where he has taught since 2012, covering topics such as criminological theory, homicide, critical violence and deviant leisure. He is currently involved in a number of ongoing research projects including a monograph exploring new perspectives on crimes of the powerful, contemporary examinations into the role of public criminology and developing the concept of graze theory.

Craig Kelly is Lecturer in Criminology at Birmingham City University, where he has taught since 2018. In this time, he has taught topics such as crime, media, culture, research methods and deviant leisure. His previous work has centred upon violence, drug markets and theorisation of homicide. Alongside Adam Lynes, he edited a book in 2020 that sought to question how criminology analyses video games. He is currently involved in a number of projects including developing the concept of graze theory. He is also undertaking PhD research around violence within the homeless milieu in the United Kingdom.

James Treadwell has been Professor in Criminology at Staffordshire University since 2017, having started his career as Lecturer in Criminology in 2003 at the University of Central England. He has recently been researching prison and criminal drug markets, examining the cultivation of cannabis in economically deprived areas and prison-based drug supply as part of a larger project on bullying, violence and victimisation in prison. He is currently involved in a number of ongoing research projects including a monograph exploring new perspectives on crimes of the powerful with Adam Lynes. He is also a member of the executive of the British Society of Criminology and was academic advisor on the Howard League Commission into Ex-Military Personnel in Prison.