The editorial team want to express immense gratitude to all contributors to the 'Forced Migration and Postcoloniality' workshop in Copenhagen in December 2019, for the generous and inspiring atmosphere, collective discussions and illuminating debates about the critical potential of engaging with colonialism in forced migration studies. The workshop was made possible with funding from the Independent Research Fund Denmark, but much gratitude is also owed to Martin Lemberg-Pedersen's research assistants Oliver Joel Halpern and Ariadni Zormpa who worked hard and generously to coordinate and liaise with contributors from all over the world in order to make the workshop logistic come together.

For many contributors, this workshop was the last in real and not virtual life before the global COVID-19 pandemic hit, and so still serves as a reminder of the wonderful potential that arises when people are brought together who share a deep desire for exploring the research agenda through interdisciplinary collaboration. While interdisciplinarity is an often-used buzzword at university management levels, the actual support granted to the opening of such spaces between disciplines continues to be the exception rather than the rule, and is far too often left to the individual researcher. This collaboration took place across many different career trajectories, ranging from early career scholars, precarious affiliations and grant pursuits, and to senior scholars embedded in time-consuming administrative work. For this reason too, the editors are thankful to the contributors for carving out time for working on this volume over the span of several years, not least as this required careful balancing acts with the obligations of care work which became so prominent during the global pandemic.

From colleagues, librarians, workshop and seminar organizers, to reviewers, mentors, friends, and persons of knowledge and from social movements, interviewed as part of this research, more people than it is possible to list here have informed, encouraged and helped shape the thoughts and analyses that follow. Some in terms of supporting the idea of an edited volume in itself, others when it comes to inspiration and advice to contributors of the individual chapters. As with any collaborative work, this too stands on top of an underforest of exchanges, sparring, insights, inspiration and generosity. Moreover, the editors also want to thank the series editors from the Global Migration and Social Change book series, as well as the team at Bristol University Press, especially Shannon Kneis and Anna Richardson, who were precise and respectful of the intellectual direction of the volume they facilitated, but also patient when it came to deadlines in the midst of a global pandemic. Also, at key stages in the process, the anonymous reviewers provided insightful feedback on our book proposal, as well as on the entire manuscript.
