This book is the product of a long academic journey spanning several countries and having started with a dissertation project that has grown and developed after completion of my PhD.¹ Bringing this journey to an end would never have been possible without the tremendous support of many people along the way. First and foremost, I wish to thank the young migrants who shared the concerns and joys of their migratory experiences with me. Follow-up interviews as well as continued emails and social media messages over the years have signalled their interest in this research and have encouraged me to write an academic book that I hope is of interest to an audience beyond that of university libraries.

I would like to sincerely thank my dissertation committee, whose four members have greatly influenced my academic thinking and writing. Gracia Liu-Farrer has been an incredible source of knowledge, inspiration, critical reflection and motivation and has been an example of a researcher's passion for academic work. Her dedication to her advisees' work has impressed me and has been a guide for me when writing while balancing teaching, institutional responsibilities and my personal life. Discussions with and teaching by Glenda Roberts have directed my interest to the human side of critical academic inquiry of workplace and migration issues and have sparked my enthusiasm for ethnographic practice and writing. Miloš Debnár offered the needed support from early on during my PhD when uncertainties over the design of my doctoral project and the choice of the group in focus of the research abounded. Adrian Favell believed in my research when he agreed to co-advise my doctoral project. His theoretical ideas have sharpened the analysis and helped positioning this book at the intersections of separate academic fields, including Japanese/Asian regional studies, migration research, and the sociology of work and youth in the European Union.

¹ This book has evolved from the author's doctoral dissertation, which has been uploaded on Waseda University's repository. The author holds the full rights of the published online version of the dissertation.

Many more mentors and colleagues have supported me along the way. At Nanyang Technological University in Singapore, Laavanya Kathiravelu was a wonderful source of information and inspiration for my first field trip to the country in 2015. Two years later, Chris McMorran helped me find my way through the National University of Singapore (NUS) and connected me to its Japanese Department. Furthermore, conversations with Brenda Yeoh and Michiel Baas of the Asian Migration Cluster at the Asia Research Institute, NUS, and their feedback on conference presentations and article drafts have pushed me to think through binary migrant categories and sensitive issues of race and ethnicity. Last but not least, Peidong Yang at Nanyang Technological University has been a role model of publishing as a young academic and kindly took the time to provide feedback on a draft chapter of this book.

In Tokyo, the Graduate-School of Asia-Pacific Studies (GSAPS) at Waseda University has facilitated my research for many years and has provided the necessary institutional and logistical support for fieldwork, participation at conferences and academic exchange. Jotaro Kato and Noriko Fujita have been companions on conferences and for discussions and helped with the right nuances in Japanese titles or expressions for my research, for which I am grateful. My friends in Tokyo and Germany supported my enthusiasm for research and listened to problems when needed, for which I want to thank you Jasmin Roth, Chimin Kawa, Momoko Ozawa, Katja Wickles, Misato Hashimoto, Reina Kusui and Ayano Osanai. My special thanks goes to Kim Suan Lim, my dear friend at GSAPS, and Tricia Okada, who turned our writing group into an anchor during my postdoctoral fellowship at Waseda, as well as to Aimi Muranaka and Megha Wadhwa, who shared the ups and downs of life as a junior academic with me.

I also want to thank Karen Shire, Nana Oishi, Kumiko Kawashima, James Farrer, Ryoko Yamamoto, Gabriele Vogt, Jamie Coates, Jie Zhang, Jenny Phillimore, Anne Stefanie Aronsson and Yen-Fen Tseng for stimulating discussions and constructive feedback during different stages of research and writing. In Zurich, David Chiavacci has supported the completion of this book by commenting on the proposal draft and by always offering an answer to academic questions. I am grateful for having had the opportunity to become a member of the collaborative research group at UZH and of WriteLab at the Max Planck Institute for the Study of Religious and Ethnic Diversity, which took the time to critically comment on the revised chapters of this book. Finally, I particularly want to thank Lin (Lynn) Yu Ng and Zanete Zujeva for their assistance over the course of compiling interview transcriptions, proofreading, copy-editing and formatting of this book. Beyond their support as research assistants, I appreciate Lynn's and Zanete's thoughtful reflections on the clarity and nuances of my writing which have improved the book as it stands.

I am indebted to the financial funding I received along the way of completing this research project. Without the MEXT (Japanese government) scholarship for graduate school, the Haraguchi Memorial Asia Research Fund for the field trips to Singapore and the Early Career Scientists award by the Japanese Society for the Promotion of Science I would not have been able to study in Japan, collect the data in Tokyo and Singapore, nor present my analysis globally and develop the project into a book.

I would never have had the drive nor the confidence to embark on the journey of book writing if there was not my family, close friends, and my husband. They all believed in me and gave me the energy to continue despite setbacks and self-doubts. I am grateful to my parents for providing what they could to prepare me for what literally became a global life and for their unflagging support and patience during hectic and emotionally constraining times. I also want to thank my parents-in-law for their warmth when starting the revisions for this book in a new country after many years in Tokyo. My sisters have always been both family and friends. Thank you for visiting me in my adopted home, for listening and giving feedback and for the many joyful times that balanced out the research-intensive ones. Finally, thank you Ondrej for going through all this together with me and for sharing this mobile story.
