

Acknowledgments

WRITING A BOOK is a solitary enterprise, yet completion is seldom achieved without the support and encouragement of friends, family, and colleagues. A project that has been 'in progress' as long as this one creates especially large debts of gratitude. Acknowledgment of the people who most directly supported my research and writing seems, at best, a barely adequate way to say thank you.

Three individuals deserve special mention. Margaret Prang's helpful suggestions and enduring patience were indispensable to the successful completion of my dissertation. More than anyone else Keith Ralston showed me that regional history did not have to be parochial and that British Columbia offered a field of inquiry both exciting and intellectually nourishing. He has served as a mentor and friend through the life of this project, and could tell more stories about its history than any of us would care to hear. Jean Barman has also given far more support than a friend can reasonably expect, encouraging me to believe that I had something to say, cajoling me to get on with my writing, and reading the many drafts of text that emerged when I did. Conversations with Keith and Jean substantially influenced the organization and argument of this book.

Several other colleagues and friends offered thoughtful and encouraging comments on the manuscript. Alan Tully and Louise Robert read the work in its entirety, and Roderick Barman, Fran Gundry, Irene Howard, Tina Loo, Elizabeth Mancke, Tim Stanley, and Jim Winter did so in part. Tina Loo provided references to several important theoretical works and tried to make a middle-aged empiricist more theoretically informed. Readers for the Social Science Federation presented thorough and helpful evaluations. Jocelyn Smith edited the entire work, smoothing away the rough edges of my prose. Vicky McAuley typed a grant application that saved a project.

Some debts stretch further back into the past. Such is the case with helpful comments on my earlier publications by Norbert MacDonald, Jeremy Mouat, Logan Hovis, Sharon Meen, Jill Wade, and Peter Ward. Colleagues and staff in the UBC Department of History supported the project with practical help and unstinting encouragement. Sharon Meen 'drove home' to me the advantages of writing in the active rather than passive voice.

Over the years I have received the generous assistance of many other individuals and organizations. Anne Yandle, George Brandak, and Frances Woodward at UBC's Special Collections Division provided a wonderful environment for the study of British Columbia history. Sue Baptie and the staff at the City of Vancouver Archives generously offered their professional assistance and a place to work at 'the back table.' In the early stages of my research I spent many months in Victoria reading newspapers in the basement of the Legislative Library and examining files piled high in the far corner of the Registrar of Companies Office. The British Columbia Archives and Records Service (then the Provincial Archives) similarly offered helpful assistance on many occasions. Brenda Dickau, Elizabeth Lees, Towser Jones, and Karen Peplow lightened the burden of research by exploring the lives of Vancouver's social elite, recording and coding the 1881 and 1891 censuses, and unravelling the mysteries of the Matthews Collection. Virginia Green of the UBC Arts Computing Centre always treated my uninformed questions with tolerance and respect; I appreciate her assistance very much. Jeremy Wilson provided similar guidance back in the days when computing meant punch cards and prehistoric machines. Eric Leinberger crafted the maps that grace this study, and George Vaitkunas created its attractive design. Jean Wilson of UBC Press provided wise counsel in guiding the manuscript through review, and Camilla Jenkins edited the book with impressive and sometimes daunting rigour. I am indebted as well to the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada for their generous support of my work.

Chapter 1 of this text is based on an earlier article, 'Lumber Society on the Industrial Frontier: Burrard Inlet, 1863-1886,' which appeared in Labour/Le Travail 33 (Spring 1994):69-96.

Finally, to my many friends and family I say thank you for your support and your faith that the 'book' would, eventually, be finished. I dedicate it to my parents Elsie and Lorne McDonald, who, regretfully, did not live to see the happy day.
