

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

In the preparation of this book, I have accumulated substantial debts. My former professors at Princeton University have helped in many ways too numerous to detail. Especially helpful have been Duane Lockard, Walter Murphy, Jameson W. Doig, William M. Beaney, John F. Sly, Herman M. Somers, and Paul Ylvisaker. As someone trained in American state and local politics, I was emboldened by Lockard's example to tackle the complex realities of New Jersey politics during the late nineteenth century. His constant availability and thoughtful guidance stand out.

Several other colleagues read all or part of the manuscript. None bears any responsibility for its flaws, but all helped to reduce them. They made the story better. These include John Bebout, Herbert Ershkowitz, Henry Frank, Sanford B. Gabin, James Green, Kathryn Grover, Nigel Hamilton, Morton Keller, Bruce Laurie, Maxine N. Lurie, Richard P. McCormick, Douglas V. Shaw, and Robert C. Wood. They offered welcome advice and encouragement at crucial moments in writing this book. I owe a special intellectual debt to two of my faculty colleagues at the University of Massachusetts, namely, Thomas N. Brown, a splendid historian, who broadened my understanding of the Irish and the impact of Irish-American nationalism on urban politics; and Julie Winch, another historian, who helped me to comprehend what life was like in antebellum Philadelphia, especially with regard to its black elite.

Outside the academy, I have incurred similar debts. I especially want to express my gratitude to the following people who kindly gave me much of their time to talk about the politics of Hudson County, some of whom have since passed on. These include former U.S. Senator John Milton, Raymond Coleman, John Dryden, and Joseph Davis. Much credit goes to Helen Fairbanks, librarian at Princeton University, and J. Owen Grundy, former secretary of the Hudson County Historical Society, both of whom assisted me in finding relevant data and made research a pleasant experience. Although none had any obligation to assist me, all were more than helpful. I was given many leads and explored each to its end.

I also received valuable assistance from the staffs of several libraries, particularly those of the American Philosophical Society Library, the Firestone Library at Princeton, the Jersey City Public Library, the New Jersey Historical Society Library, the New Jersey State Library, the New York Public Library, the Philadelphia Historical Society Library, and the Rutgers University Library. Collectively, these librarians helped me retrieve countless documents and records that made this book possible. Without their generous help, I would never have been able to rediscover Leon Abbett.

Grateful acknowledgment is made to the late Leon Abbett Post, the governor's grandson, who corresponded with me about his grandfather and his family history. Nina Howell Starr of Marlboro, New Hampshire, allowed me to examine the papers of her grandfather, Robert Gilchrist, who served as attorney general of New Jersey and was a political ally of Governor Abbett. Ruth Dallas of Central High School of Philadelphia and Joseph Hepburn of the Franklin Institute provided information about the education of Leon Abbett. Zara Cohan of Newark State College informed me about the fire that partially destroyed the state capitol building in Trenton in 1885. Substantial portions of the two chapters on Abbett's political apprenticeship and his battle to tax the railroads originally appeared in New Jersey History. A very special thanks goes to the New Jersey Historical Society for granting me permission to use this material.

LEON ABBETT'S NEW JERSEY

After the book was in manuscript, I had the editorial assistance of Carole LeFaivre-Rochester of the American Philosophical Society in Philadelphia. She gave more than skillful editorial help. For her unfailing sympathy, suggestion, and inspiration, I owe her a large debt and am heavily obligated to her for revisions, corrections, and uncanny detection of discrepancies.

My greatest debt is to my family. My wife Ann and six children, all of whom are now grown adults, reminded me daily about the most important things in life. Without their unstinting support, I would never have finished writing this book. My wife has been a steady influence during the inevitable highs and lows that I experienced in my struggle to understand and portray Abbett. I thank her for her patience, her kindness, her love, and her unflagging support.

Richard A. Hogarty

*Marblehead, Massachusetts
November 15, 2000*