To the National Endowment for the Humanities I am grateful for a summer stipend that allowed me to travel to Austria in 1999, to study and photograph the ruins of the Temple of Night at Schönau, and to work in the libraries of Vienna.

This book would not have been possible without the collaboration of many Austrian colleagues, including several present and former members of the Bundesdenkmalamt, the Austrian government's office for historical preservation. I thank Géza Hajós (Abteilung für historische Gartenanlagen) for accompanying me on two visits to Schönau, in 1999 and 2000; for sharing with me his knowledge and expertise during those visits and in the course of our conversations and correspondence; and for patiently allowing me to share with him my ideas and discoveries. Norbert Gauss and Johann Scheifele (Abteilung für Architektur und Bautechnik) provided me with copies of drawings (section and plan) of the grotto and Temple that the Bundesdenkmalamt produced in 2002. Walther Brauneis (Abteilung für Klangdenkmale) told me of Wenzel Johann Tomaschek's important description of the Temple and gave me a copy of it.

Waltraud Winkelbauer (Niederösterreichisches Landesarchiv in St. Pölten) helped me get my research off to a good start by sending me in 1998 much useful information about archival material related to the garden at Schönau. Helmut Kowar (Phonogrammarchiv, Vienna) gave me the benefit of his expertise in mechanical instruments, led a private tour of the Geymüllerschloss on which I heard many of the Flötenwerke preserved in that beautiful mansion, and encouraged me to publish my work on the Temple of Night. Rudolf Hopfner (Sammlung Alter Instrumenten, Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna) allowed me to study at close hand the mechanical musical instruments in the collection of the Kunsthistorisches Museum. Eva Badura-Skoda and Franz Richter, who accompanied me on my second visit to Schönau, gave me useful advice and encouragement throughout the long period on which I have worked (alas, not continuously) on this project. Michael Lorenz answered many queries, found and copied for me an important article in a journal to which I had no access, gave me valuable advice on archival research in Vienna, shared with me the results of his own archival work on Peter von Braun and his family, and checked some of my transcriptions of German texts. Rita Steblin, in reading chapter 8, gave me the benefit of her knowledge of Joseph Deym and his Kunstgalerie.

In the United States, Daniel Hertz and Louise Rice read an early draft and made many useful suggestions for improving it. David J. Buch and Eugene F. Rice read parts of the manuscript and gave me much valuable help. John Johnston drew the plan of the Temple. Linda B. Parshall advised me on a book she knows more about than anyone else, Hirschfeld's Theorie der Gartenkunst.

In France, Michel Noiray's reading of the manuscript led to many improvements, while my discussions with Andrew Zega and Bernd H. Dams helped me to clarify my ideas about the construction and appearance of the Temple of Night. This remarkable team of artist-historians made the watercolor reconstruction of the Temple, thus crowning this work of scholarship with a work of art.

I would like to thank Mariza de Andrade, Dominique Césari, and Jeffery Howe for permission to reproduce their photographs, and David Hays, who read the manuscript for the American
