

Contents

1	Introduction	I
	When Chinese Medicine Encountered the State
	Beyond the Dual History of Tradition and Modernity
	Toward a Coevolutionary History
	China's Modernity
	The Discourse of Modernity
	Neither Donkey nor Horse
	Conventions
2	Sovereignty and the Microscope:
	The Containment of the Manchurian
	Plague, 1910–11	21
	Not Believing That "This Plague Could Be Infectious"
	Pneumonic Plague versus Bubonic Plague
	"The Most Brutal Policies Seen in Four Thousand Years"
	Challenges from Chinese Medicine: Hong Kong versus Manchuria
	Chuanran : Extending a Network of Infected Individuals
	Avoiding Epidemics
	Joining the Global Surveillance System
	Conclusion: The Social Characteristics of the Manchurian
	Plague

- 3 Connecting Medicine with the State: From Missionary Medicine to Public Health,
1860–1928 45
- Missionary Medicine
Western Medicine in Late Qing China versus Meiji Japan
The First Generation of Chinese Practitioners of Western Medicine
Western Medicine as a Public Enterprise
“Public Health: Time Not Ripe for Large Work,” 1914–24
The Ministry of Health and the Medical Obligations of Modern Government, 1926–27
Conclusion
- 4 Imagining the Relationship between Chinese
Medicine and Western Medicine, 1890–1928 69
- Converging Chinese and Western Medicine in the Late 1890s
Non-Identity between the Meridian Channels and the Blood Vessels
Yu Yan and the Tripartition of Chinese Medicine
To Avoid the Place of Confrontation
Ephedrine and Scientific Research on Nationally Produced
Drugs
Inventing an Empirical Tradition of Chinese Medicine
Conclusion
- 5 The Chinese Medical Revolution and the National Medicine Movement 97
- The Chinese Medical Revolution
Controversy over Legalizing Schools of Chinese Medicine
Abolishing Chinese Medicine: The Proposal of 1929
The March Seventeenth Demonstration
The Ambivalent Meaning of Guoyi
The Delegation to Nanjing
Envisioning National Medicine
Conclusion
- 6 Visualizing Health Care in 1930s Shanghai 121
- Reading a Chart of the Medical Environment in Shanghai
Western Medicine: Consolidation and Boundary-Drawing

10	State Medicine for Rural China, 1929–49	223
	Defining China’s Medical Problem
	Discovering Rural China
	The Ding County Model of Community Medicine
	State Medicine and the Chinese Medical Association
	State Medicine and Local Self-Government
	The Issue of Eliminating Village Health Workers
	Chinese Medicine for Rural China
11	Conclusion: Thinking with Modern Chinese Medicine	259
	Medicine and the State
	Creation of Values
	Medicine and China’s Modernity: Nationalist versus Communist
	Chinese Medicine and Science and Technology Studies
	Acknowledgments	283
	Notes	289
	Index	359