

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Although writing can make one feel alone, this book reflects the efforts of many people. Thomas Kessner, Gerald Markowitz, Owen Gutfreund, Setha Low, Brendan O'Malley, Mark Rose, Gwynneth Malin, and Paul Naish read and commented on earlier drafts. Their input was invaluable. I owe a special thanks to David Nasaw, who not only helped me shape the book but also convinced me to write it in the first place.

I was lucky to find a home in the history department at James Madison University, where my colleagues have been warm and welcoming. Kevin Borg, Emily Westkaemper, and Michael Douma deserve particular recognition for reading individual chapters, as do Gabrielle Lanier and Andrew Witmer (who also helped me rewrite a particularly ugly paragraph) for letting me stand in their doorways as I complained about the challenges of writing, researching, and publishing. Summer research grants from the history department and the Edna T. Shaeffer Humanist Award from the College of Arts and Letters provided the resources to finish the project. David Jeffrey, the dean of the college, kindly agreed to allocate funds to help cover the costs of image permissions.

At the University of Chicago Press, I would like to thank Robert Devens for his initial interest, Nora Devlin for assisting in some of the technical matters, Caterina MacLean for copyediting, and Timothy Mennel for expertly shepherding this book to its current form. I am especially grateful to Timothy Gilfoyle, a terrific historian and a generous man. He has now supported this project (and me) for many years, reading every word of the book and offering sage advice on how to improve it. Likewise, the anonymous reviewers read my manuscript carefully and offered helpful suggestions, as did Zachary Schrag, who read the entire book twice and provided as intelligent a critique as anyone. Foolishly, I did not follow all of their suggestions and, thus, they shoulder no blame for the many flaws that remain.

Librarians, archivists, and fellow researchers ably assisted in finding sources and making sense of them. Specifically, the staffs of the New-York Historical Society, the New York Public Library, the Brooklyn Public Library, the Historical Society of Washington, DC, the Library of Congress, the National Museum of American History Library, the Washington DC Public Library, the Minneapolis City Archives, the Chicago History Museum, the Pennsylvania State Archives, the Municipal Archives in New York, the Chicago Public Library, the Newberry Library, the Rochester Public Library, the San Francisco History Center, the San Francisco Municipal Library, the California Historical Society, the Bancroft Library, the Harvard University Archives, the Schlesinger Library, the University of Virginia Library, and the James Madison University libraries all warrant a sincere thank you. I also want to acknowledge Thomas Cameron Burr, Ross Petty, Bruce Epperson, Captain Jack, and Louis Gimelli for sharing sources and knowledge, or for helping me to remember a word that I had misplaced.

My parents, Mike and Rose, deserve special recognition. Without them, for many reasons, this would never have been possible. I was also fortunate to inherit Ellen and Les Cohen as in-laws; they have given me unbridled support ever since.

Most importantly, I need to thank Amanda. As I worked on this project, she worked just as hard as my editor, wife, friend, distractor, baker, and wonderful mother to our two boys. Miles and Quincy have made writing this book all the more difficult, but only because they have made my life so much richer. And so it is to my family—Amanda, Miles, and Quincy—that I dedicate this book.
