I have been fortunate, in the course of research, writing, and learning to rely upon a large community of scholars, friends, and family in many places:

At the University of Cambridge, my colleagues at the Department of Politics and International Studies provided valuable feedback during final revisions; Pembroke College and the Centre for History and Economics gave space and time in which to complete them. At the University of Chicago, my colleagues and students at the Department of Political Science, the Committee on Southern Asian Studies, the Chicago Center for Contemporary Theory, and the Center for Middle Eastern Studies provided invaluable critique and support. Lisa Wedeen and Dan Slater read the manuscript in its various iterations repeatedly and challenged me to make it the best book it could be; John Comaroff, Bernard Harcourt, and Gary Herrigel helped me remember what the book was about in the first place. My appreciation also goes to David Brent and David Pervin at the University of Chicago Press for their guidance, patience, and acuity, and to the press reviewers for their richly detailed and constructive comments.

At the University of Washington, Michael W. McCann, Joel S. Migdal, Ellis Goldberg, and Daniel S. Lev provided invaluable supervision, support, and mentorship from which I continue to benefit. Also at the University of Washington, many thanks are due to Gad Barzilai, Jessica Beyer, Ann Buscherfeld, Rachel Cichowski, Christine DiStefano, Steven Herbert, Arda Ibikoglu, Margaret Levi, Clark Lombardi, Arzoo Osanloo, Vicente Rafael, Susanne Recordon, Laurie Sears, Kristen Stilt, Allison Waggener-Boyd, Susan Whiting, and Farhat Ziadeh.

Shamsul A. B., Zainah Anwar, Laura Fan, Muhammad Kamal Hassan, Mulaika Hijjas and family, Muhammad Hashim Kamali, Clive Kessler, Sumit Mandal, Norani Othman, and Dato' Seri Tunku Putri Intan Safinaz have my deepest appreciation for their support while I was in Malaysia. In the United Kingdom, the help of Annabel Gallop, Simon Over, William Roff, and William Gervase Clarence Smith was invaluable.

Many generous scholars have taken time to read and critique sections of this work in its various iterations, corrected some of its errors and supported its progress in varied ways: Leila Ahmed, Karen Barkey, Eve Darian-Smith, Michael Gilson, Tim Harper, Enid Hill, Elizabeth Hurd, Ayesha Jalal, Baber Johansen, Diana Kim, Brinckley Messick, Sally Merry, Michael Peletz, Barbara Powell, Justin Richland, Lawrence Rosen, Mitra Sharafi, Kristen Stilt, Charles Tilly (and the Contentious Politics Seminar at Columbia University), Christopher Tomlins, Frank Vogel, Susanne Wengle, and Malika Zeghal, as well as groups at Harvard University, Yale Law School (Critical Islamic Reflections), the University of Washington, the National University of Singapore, and New York University (Hagop Kevorkian Center for Near Eastern Studies). Robert Hefner, Saba Mahmood, Mahmood Mamdani, Tamir Moustafa, Justin Richland, Dan Slater, Lisa Wedeen, and other colleagues very generously gave of their time and expertise toward the final revision of this manuscript at a day-long workshop at the University of Chicago.

This project was supported at various stages by the National Science Foundation, the American Council of Learned Societies, the Council on Library and Information Resources, the Mellon Foundation, the University of Washington, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, Harvard Law School, and the University of Chicago.

My parents, Salimah A. Samad and Hussin Mutalib, raised me in a household of ideas and of courage; my brother, Luqman, and my sister, Aziah, have been my teachers and fellow travelers. Cyndie McLachlan sheltered me; Devin McLachlan gave new meaning to the concept of home; Suhail and Maryam filled it with joy. To my family—gratitude beyond words.
