

Acknowledgments

The completion of this project has brought many satisfactions, not the least of which is a fuller appreciation of the depth of gratitude expressed in a writer's acknowledgments. This book began as a dissertation at the University of Pennsylvania. My supervisor, Michael Katz, provided unfailingly precise, timely, and judicious advice throughout my graduate career and beyond. His ability to ask nagging questions, questions that continued to haunt my thoughts long after I first imagined them answered, vastly improved every facet of this book. In addition, Thomas Sugrue, Michael Zuckerman, Ewa Morawska, and Daniel Richter read and commented on the entire dissertation. Their comments invariably lifted this project along when it threatened to flag. The quantitative aspects of this work benefitted from the help of Mark Stern and Amy Hillier, both of whom were tremendously responsive and patient in the face of my considerable demands. Additional technical assistance was provided by Lauris Olson and Laurie Allen at the University of Pennsylvania, and Laine G. M. Ruus, Sushil Kumar, and Marcel Fortin at the University of Toronto.

At Penn, I found myself surrounded by a remarkable group of graduate students. Julia Rabig's creative, eclectic intelligence remains an invaluable resource for my work, just as her delightful company has proved indispensable at conferences. Thanks also to Benjamin Field, Leah Gordon, and Domenic Vitiello, each of whom read parts of my dissertation or closely related work. Conversations with others in the department also sharpened my thinking. Special thanks to Francesca Bregoli, Christina Collins, Amy Garrett, Christopher Klemek, Ben Mercer, Richard Ninnis, Anne Oravetz, Katie Paugh, James Saporito, Peter Siskind, Lorrin Thomas, and Francis Ryan.

Since my return to Canada, generous institutions and welcoming colleagues have helped to nurture this book. When I was still a student, Rick Halpern invited me to spend two years at the Centre for the Study of the United States at the University of Toronto. While there, I benefited from Steve Penfold's cheerful companionship at street processions, calming advice about the job market, and frequent reminders that the book ought to include quotes as well as numbers. Franca Iacovetta provided advice early in this project and, toward the end, miraculously excavated tables from her own dissertation for my use. As supervisor of my postdoctoral fellowship, John Zucchi read the entire manuscript, providing useful advice and much appreciated support.

At the University of Victoria, the flexibility of the dean of humanities, Andrew Rippin, as well as department chairs Eric Sager and Tom Saunders, afforded me extraordinary research and writing opportunities during the first three years of my appointment. My colleagues in the history department have extended a warm welcome. Special thanks are owed to Peter Baskerville, Sara Beam, Greg Blue, John Lutz, Lynne Marks, Eric Sager, Elizabeth Vibert, and Wendy Wickwire, all of whom have read my work, hosted my family, or otherwise made me feel especially welcome at the university and in Victoria. On very short notice, Jason Colby read the entire book manuscript in its final stages and has graciously accepted responsibility for any shortcomings that still remain. Many other scholars were also generous with their time and responsive to this work. Richard Harris, Chad Gaffield, Russell Kazal, and Thomas Guglielmo read the entire manuscript and provided important feedback. Conversations and exchange with Christopher Friedrichs, Donna Gabaccia, Steven High, Robert Lewis, Robert McDonald, Bruno Ramirez, Coll Thrush, and Henry Yu improved my work while also making it more enjoyable.

This work also benefited from the help of archivists at the Philadelphia City Archives, the Philadelphia Archdiocesan Historical Research Center, the City of Toronto Archives, and the Archives of Ontario. The Archives of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Toronto deserves particular mention. Under the directorship of Marc Lerman, the archive is a model of efficiency and professionalism. Fathers Gregory Botte, Herb Sperger, Arthur I. Taraborelli, Anthony J. D'Angelico, and Gary Pacitti trusted me enough to launch this project. Residents of the Italian parishes in both cities were generous with their time and open in their recollections. The hours that I spent reminiscing with longtime Italian residents of both cities were the highlights of this process. Vince Pietropaolo deserves special thanks for a lengthy and informative interview and for his wonderful photographs. Thanks also to Francesca Schembri for sharing considerable insight and a memorable dinner on a cold Toronto evening. Pasang Thachhoe at the Multicultural Historical Society of Ontario provided gracious assistance during the many hours I spent in his company listening to the recollections of Italian Torontonians.

Various agencies have supported this research during the past decade. Thanks are owed to the University of Pennsylvania's Graduate Fellowships, Benjamin Franklin Fellowships, and Annenberg Graduate Fellowships; the Social Science and Humanities Research Council of Canada; internal grants at the University of Victoria; as well as to the Catholic Historical Association, the Salvatori Research Award at the University of Pennsylvania, and the Association for Canadian Studies in the United States.

My experience with the University of Chicago Press has exemplified the best of academic publishing. Tough but supportive anonymous readers vastly improved this book. Harry Johnson worked quickly and cheerfully to make my maps more attractive and communicative. Timothy Gilfoyle provided careful and frank editing, and Robert Devens gently pushed the project forward from the start. I am simply delighted to publish the book in a series that I have long admired.

There are also those whose support defies cataloging. My closest friends and family have been deeply enmeshed in this work, suffering my attempts to reinvent household modes of production, entertaining my efforts to clarify thoughts by speaking them aloud, and providing frequent and abundant reason for celebration and distraction. Jeff Allred, Gretchen Aguiar, Eric Adams, and Sarah Krotz have accompanied me throughout this process. I am profoundly grateful for our friendships. My in-laws, and in particular Sheila and Melvin Stanger, have welcomed me and my work with warmth and a sometimes daunting faith in my abilities. Living near my family in Toronto for a period of this work was a great pleasure. My siblings, Corey and Ilana, and their spouses, Diana and Dan, along with my wonderful niece Maia, tremendously enriched the choreography of my daily life for the period that I spent among them. My grandmother, Edith Ross, has shown unfailing interest in this project, even if she sometimes thought that my time ought to be spent in front of a classroom rather than a computer. My parents, Hildy and Michael Ross, have continued to be models of both scholarship and family. My mother was always on hand for emergency statistical analyses, and their seaside home in Nova Scotia was the site of my best and most enjoyable work. Ilana Stanger-Ross has filled the last decade and a half of my life with love, inspiration, beauty, and laughter. She gave this manuscript its final read, even as she balanced the demands of her own forthcoming book and her studies to become a midwife. I am lucky to share my life with someone who does so much so well. It is because of her, and now our delightful daughters Tillie and Eva, that I write these sentences brimming with happiness.
