

EDITOR'S ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

My work on preparing this volume for publication was greatly helped by many people and institutions. First of all, I am grateful to Karen Merikangas Darling of the University of Chicago Press for inviting me to edit Thomas Kuhn's unfinished book, and for giving me the time and freedom necessary to complete this task in a manner that seemed best to me. I am also grateful to Karen for introducing me to Kuhn's literary executors, his widow Jehane Kuhn and his daughter, Sarah Kuhn. Their enthusiasm for and faith in the project were of vital importance throughout. Jehane's knowledge of the history of the manuscripts and of Kuhn's own ideas concerning posthumous publication of his works was invaluable. She threw light on a number of points that could not be resolved on the basis of the extant texts alone. I am deeply saddened that she did not live to finally hold this book in her hands. Sarah Kuhn, in continuing as her father's literary executor, has displayed outstanding generosity and integrity. I am grateful for her reliable help, and for her genuine warmth. This volume is dedicated to her.

For two semesters, the Oakley Center for the Humanities and Social Sciences provided a peaceful space and research funds to work on this project. I am grateful to the center's administrative director Krista Birch, to two consecutive Williams College faculty directors, Jana Sawicki and Gage McWeeny, and to a number of the Oakley fellows who gave me important comments and suggestions. I would also like to acknowledge the help that I received from the knowledgeable and extremely efficient staff at the Institute Archives and Special Collections, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, where the Thomas S. Kuhn Papers are kept.

Two people deserve a special mention. Evan Pence, my research assistant, contributed enormously to the clarity and readability of the primary texts, and helped me complete and update all of Kuhn's references. He also made many excellent philosophical points and suggestions, most of which I was, regrettably, unable to address in this volume; but I am still thinking about them. Mane Hajdin read carefully and constructively all of the editorial contributions to the volume, and gave me many insightful and useful suggestions. His support was vital for the completion of this work, as it always is.
