

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Nearly ten years have passed from the original inception of this project to its final completion. Certainly, when something takes as much time and energy out of one's life as this has of mine, it could not be done alone. In the last decade I have been aided and encouraged by numerous people who stood behind me to make sure that I did, indeed, finish. Most critically, I want to thank my respondents, who sometimes took great risks in order to help me.

The support of my teacher, mentor, friend, and colleague, Jack Douglas, was instrumental in each phase of the research and writing. Jack was there when I first had the idea to make this subculture an object of sociological analysis. Through his close personal contact, joint involvement, and guidance during my early years in the setting, he developed my instinct and appreciation for investigative participant observation as both a science and an art form. He then pushed me, cajoled me, and backed me at times when the research became either too dangerous, too confusing, or too troublesome to continue. But most important, the tremendous impact that his own life's work has had on me guides everything I have done and will continue to do in sociology. Fred Davis, another member of the sociology faculty at the University of California, San Diego, served as a stalwart supporter, certain of my abilities and confident in my ambitions. He never questioned whether I would finish, as others did, but provided unerring impetus and prodding to make sure that I forged ahead. Cesar Graña allowed me to pursue a topic that others found strange, worthless, or petty. He permitted me the latitude to explore this scene as I thought best. I also received intellectual, emotional, and material support from other members of the UCSD community, especially Renee Anspach, Rae Blumberg, Ginny Forrest-Madison, and Jacqueline Wiseman.

Throughout my years in sociology, I have been blessed with knowing a number of people whose friendships prove to be the most important reason why I remain so excited about my work and the discipline in general. Scholars such as John Johnson, Peter Manning, Marvin Scott, and Lou Zurcher have delighted and inspired me with the vitality of their human contact as well as their creative sociological enterprise. Others, such as that small group of existential sociologists, David Altheide, Andy Fontana, Joe Kotarba, Paul Rasmussen, and Carol Warren, share with me the joy of searching for people's feelings and subjective understandings. I have also been profoundly moved or influenced along the way theoretically and/or personally by Marvin Cummins, Murray Davis, Gary Fine, Ruth Horowitz, John Irwin, Carl Klockars, Stan Lyman, David Pittman, Craig Reinerman, Marsha Rosenbaum, David Snow, Malcolm Spector, and Dan Waldorf. Friends, such as Jim Morgan, Heidi Glow, and John Gundersen, who are not sociologists but have a great understanding of the human condition, helped lend a different kind of "optic" to the final analysis.

In completing this project, I have had the good fortune of being surrounded by a vibrant group of people in the Department of Sociology at the University of Tulsa. Jean Blocker, Jean Burfoot, Douglas Eckberg, Barry Kinsey, and Burke Rochford remind me often of how we, as a discipline, can continue to be creative. Their enthusiasm for sociology has been infectious and has kept me going. I want to especially thank Tom Staley, Provost of the University of Tulsa, a colleague and a friend, who acted on blind faith in giving me financial and emotional support. Kelly Peterson helped to coordinate administrative tasks in the final stages of the project.

There have been several people from the publishing community who have been noteworthy for their interest and fellowship throughout this project. Herb Johnson of JAI Press, John Tryneski of the University of Chicago Press, and John Moore and Maureen MacGrogan of Columbia University Press showed faith in me even before the manuscript was fully developed. Frank Graham of Mayfield Publishing enlightened me with his knowledge, insights, and humor. A debt of friendship and gratitude also belongs to Mitch Allen, formerly of Sage Publications, whose call to the arts is sociology's great loss.

My parents and in-laws gave me the confidence in myself, the quest for learning, the unconditional love, and the financial assistance that I needed to achieve this goal. I hope that I will always be the kind of person that will make them proud.

My children, Jori and Brye, filled my life with more joy, happiness, purpose, and love than I ever thought possible. They taught me about human nature, creative development, and the existential self, bringing out brute instincts I never knew I had and making my life complete.

Finally, my husband, Peter, truly a co-author of this work, has been my steady companion for fourteen years, sharing every aspect of my personal and professional life. He has been more than a loving, sensitive, liberated, nurturant husband; he has been my true other half. To him I respectfully and lovingly dedicate this book.

Earlier versions of chapters 4 and 7 and parts of chapter 8 appeared as, respectively: Patricia A. Adler and Peter Adler, "Relationships Between Dealers: The Social Organization of Illicit Drug Transactions," Sociology and Social Research, vol. 67, no. 3, copyright © 1983 Sociology and Social Research; idem, "Shifts and Oscillations in Deviant Careers: The Case of Upper-Level Drug Dealers and Smugglers," Social Problems, vol. 31, no. 2, copyright © 1983 The Society for the Study of Social Problems Inc.; and idem, "Criminal Commitment Among Drug Dealers," Deviant Behavior, vol. 3, no. 2, copyright © 1982 Hemisphere Publishing Corporation. I am grateful to the publishers and copyright holders for permission to reprint this material.

