Writing a book is in many ways an unavoidably solitary task, but for me it has not been a lonely one. Any faults you may find with the book are my responsibility, but my work has benefited immeasurably from the assistance, support, feedback, and patience of so many people, and finishing this book gives me the opportunity to thank them.

First, I owe my deepest gratitude to the many people in New York City, New Jersey, Washington, DC, and elsewhere, who shared their stories, expertise, opinions, and feelings as I pursued answers to my research questions. I thank them for their time, candor, and trust. To those I met who were recovering from Hurricane Sandy, I am so humbled and grateful for the invitations into your homes. Even though those homes may not have lived up to your standards, or yet felt presentable for guests, they were spaces of such kindness and care to me. I owe special thanks to Joseph Pupello and David Gaul of Zone A New York, Amy Bach of United Policyholders, and Carolyn Nagy and Matthew Hassett of the Center for New York City Neighborhoods, who invited me to turn my research findings into materials that might help Hurricane Sandy-affected residents, exposing me to the power and importance of public sociology. I also thank Katherine Greig, with the New York City Mayor's Office of Recovery and Resiliency, who was always keen to share ideas and to discuss really complex questions about the future of New York City.

This book began as my PhD dissertation at the University of California, Berkeley. There I benefited from the tremendous intellectual firepower of my faculty advisors and fellow graduate students. Marion Fourcade provided indispensable guidance and encouragement as not only the chair of my dissertation committee, but as a mentor through the entirety of graduate school and beyond. She showed incredible trust and patience when I would come into her office to riff about my semiformed ideas and she believed in the project, and in me, the whole way. My intellectual development generally, and this project specifically, have benefited enormously from her ability to be simultaneously demanding and kind. Neil Fligstein kept me tethered to the big questions when I went wading into the weeds of flood insurance history and administration, helping me always to think about the more broadly sociological significance of my research. I am grateful for his attention and interest. Cal Morrill taught me how to do qualitative research. He let fifteen-minute meetings stretch to take up the better part of an hour and provided careful feedback on drafts, which was precious to me. He helped me to distill my sprawling ideas, and his creativity inspired me at every turn. I always left his office excited to keep working. I am also grateful to Arlie Hochschild, who took me on as a research assistant on her own project about environmental peril, but who always took time out of our meetings to ask about how my work was going. Working for her was a master class in conducting and writing up research from a place of earnest curiosity and empathy. At Berkeley, I was also helped along through my participation in several workshops with faculty members and my fellow graduate students. Heather Haveman, Anne Swidler, and Cihan Tugal provided comments on work in progress, as well as valuable advice, in those settings. I am grateful to Alex Roehrkasse, Ben Shestakofsky, Roi Livne, Katherine Hood, Beth Pearson, Jonah Stuart Brundage, Jacob Habinek, Daniel Kluttz, Sarah Macdonald, Herbert Docena, Sunmin Kim, Gowri Vijayakumar, Carter Koppelman, Ryan Calder, Carlos Bustamante, Megan Poppel, Peter Ekman, and Caleb Scoville. All of them read and responded to early drafts, or listened to me present them, and they were wonderful friends to me besides.

If I left an intellectually supportive community behind at Berkeley, it was only to join another at the London School of Economics, where the project of writing this book began. I have been privileged to have as mentors Bridget Hutter and Nigel Dodd, who were excited about this book and gave me useful guidance as I worked on it. In our departmental writing group and in conversations over coffee, I received indispensable feedback and advice on the book proposal, chapter drafts, and revisions from Fabien Accominotti, Carrie Friese, Sam Friedman, Liene Ozolina-Fitzgerald, Monika Krause, Sara Salem, Jeremy Brice, Alexander Dobeson, Jonathan Mijs, Ioanna Gouseti, and Leon Wansleben, along with a fabulous crew of our PhD students. I have also learned by the example of my colleagues, as I've engaged with their research and seen their own projects come to fruition. I am also thankful for the support I've received from my affiliations with the LSE's Grantham Research Institute on Climate Change and the Environment, the LSE US Centre, and the Centre for the Analysis of Risk and Regulation. All of these research centers gave me opportunities to share my work in progress.

I never anticipated when I began this project that I would find so many wonderful fellow travelers in the world of floods, disasters, risk, finance, insurance, and climate change. It has been a privilege of my life just to be around these people, to talk to them about this project, and to think through its various dimensions in dialogue with their own work. Karen O'Neill sought me out at the first American Sociological Association meeting where I presented some of this research and encouraged me from the very start. Through ASA I also met Rachael Shwom, who provided valuable advice and encouragement on some early drafts. I have been lucky to be a part of a group of scholars writing about the intersections of insurance and climate change: Turo-Kimmo Lehtonen, Stephen Collier, Savannah Cox, Zac Taylor, Leigh Johnson, Kevin Grove, and Ian Gray. Conversations with them about shared interests have helped me enormously in articulating the stakes of my own research. My work has also improved thanks to the interventions of the critical disaster studies researchers convened by Andy Horowitz, Jacob Remes, and Elizabeth Angell; Ryan Hagen and Scott Knowles read carefully and responded constructively to my work in that context. It was also a joy and privilege to collaborate with environmental writer Elizabeth Rush along the way.

I owe incredible debts to Kasia Paprocki, Liz Koslov, and Daniel Aldana Cohen, my most generous and consistent interlocutors and collaborators on all things related to the social life of climate change. So many of the moments of clarity in writing this book came out of their reading parts of it. I am routinely awed by their own powers of insight and analysis and have been so fortunate to benefit from their respective expertise and collective wisdom. Kasia in particular, as my colleague at the LSE and dear friend, has been the wind in my sails throughout this process. It is no exaggeration to say I could not have done it without her.

If I could thank by name everyone who attended one of my talks about chapters of this book or who asked a penetrating question, I would. But suffice it to say that I am very grateful to audiences and copanelists at various professional conferences and workshops over the years. In these settings, I owe particular thanks to Asa Maron, Daniel Hirschman, Ann Orloff, Isaac Martin, Miriam Greenberg, Emanuel Ubert, Liz McFall, Ine Van Hoyweghen, Mikell Hyman, Marie Piganiol, Sebastian Kohl, Brett Christophers, and Debbie Becher for their generative comments as discussants and organizers.

Sections of this book have appeared in journal articles and I thank those publishers for allowing me to reuse my previously published material in some of the chapters in this book. Parts of chapter 2 appeared in “Scarier than Another Storm: Values at Risk in the Mapping and Insuring of U.S. Floodplains,” in the British Journal of Sociology 70, no. 3 (2019): 1067–1090, published by Wiley. Chapter 4 expands on “Who Pays for the Next Wave? The American Welfare State and Responsibility for Flood Risk,” in Politics & Society 45, no. 3 (2017): 415–440, published by SAGE.

I thank the Department of Sociology at the University of California, Berkeley; the Mellon Foundation and American Council of Learned Societies; and Phi Beta Kappa for the financial support that made this research possible.

My thanks to Eric Schwartz, my editor at Columbia University Press, for his support, expert advice, and critical eye, and to Bridget Flannery-McCoy, who first mentioned me to Eric. Thanks also to series editors Lori Peek, Dana Fisher, and Evan Schofer, who saw the potential of this book before it was written and who cheered me on along the way. The anonymous reviewers of both the proposal and the full manuscript also did me and this project a huge service; thank you for the thorough and thoughtful feedback, which guided my revisions. I am thankful also to Lowell Frye, Kathryn Jorge, Anne Sanow, and the entire production team at Columbia University Press for the time and care they have put into preparing this manuscript for production.

Finally, I thank the friends and family who have sustained me these last several years. I thank my parents, Beth and John Elliott, and my grandmother, Bernice Karp, a wonderful New Yorker who passed away while I was finalizing this manuscript, for urging me to follow my bliss. I thank my brother, Peter Elliott, for his wit and lessons in heterodox economics. The extended Duncan family has surrounded me with warmth. I thank my friends in New York City, who gave me reasons beyond research to want to spend so much time there, especially Jessie Katz, Adrienne Trinko, Lauren Trinko, Libby Burton, Matt Sherrill, John Wunderlin, Chris Boulos, Chris and Alexandra Wrobel, and Leslie and Steve Goldrich, who housed me for parts of my fieldwork. Emily Timberlake and Katharine Blake, both wonderful writers and friends, commiserated when it was hard to get words on the page and when it was hard to let them go. Anders Bjornberg quite literally nourished me through the writing of the book, with home-cooked meals and freshly baked loaves of bread. Finally, I thank my partner, Andrew Duncan, whose unflinching faith in me has propelled me through moments of doubt and whose love enriches the celebration of every achievement.

Three weeks after I submitted the draft of this manuscript to Eric, I gave birth to Ruth Elliott Duncan. I have been able to follow every difficult day of revising with her infectious laughs and irresistible smiles. She makes everything worth doing and a more humane future worth fighting for. I dedicate this book to her.
