THERE ARE SO MANY INDIVIDUALS who have contributed to my development as a person, student, investor, and writer. Inevitably, a certain number of individuals will be left out of my acknowledgments, but please do not take this as a lack of gratefulness on my behalf.

Starting off with an old family joke—if we go by order of appearance in my life movie, my mother and father, Karen and David Everett, are the first to appear in the credits. Both of you have encouraged me and stuck by me through thick and thin. When things have looked the most difficult, you have always been there to reassure me I could overcome even the most daunting obstacles. There is no way to fully capture my thanks to you both in words.

I move next to the same person who this book is dedicated to: Edith Everett. When I look at who I am as a person today, as well as the areas of interest I have pursued, the mark that Edith Everett and my late grandfather Henry Everett have left is unmistakable. Continuing with the life movie analogy, if there was one character who helped shape the plot arc that led me to write this book, it was my grandmother. Grandma, you have always supported my love for investing and philosophy. You have taught me to measure success in ways far beyond financial success. I am so happy to dedicate this book to you as a small token of my appreciation for everything you have done for me.

Next, I move on to my academic parents. These include the professors who were instrumental to my intellectual development, without whom I do not know if I would be where I am today. Although many professors have inspired me during my eight years in higher education, I want to acknowledge four in particular. These four professors represent what I see as the four key components of my higher education experience: undergraduate studies in finance, undergraduate studies in philosophy, graduate studies in business, and graduate studies in law.

One professor who was instrumental in my undergraduate finance education at Bucknell University was Professor Janice Traflet. My journey with Professor Traflet goes all the way back to my first semester of college. From the very beginning of my first course with her, Professor Traflet encouraged my passion for investing. She noticed a spark in me that had been there since my initial foray into the stock market when I was only twelve years old. However, instead of making me feel odd about my love for financial markets, she made me feel like I should be proud to have such a profound interest in the field at such a young age. I took three courses with Professor Traflet during my undergraduate education at Bucknell, and each time I came away with a renewed love for financial markets. She has continued to be a key source of inspiration and advice during pivotal transition points in my life. Most recently, she encouraged me to push forward with my efforts to get this book published. Professor Traflet, thank you so much for your support.

One professor who was instrumental in my undergraduate philosophy education at Bucknell University was Professor Peter Groff. I still remember seeing the Jewish Philosophy course listed in the spring semester of my first year. I was so intrigued by the course description that I told Professor Groff I would take the prerequisite Philosophy 100 course simultaneously so that I could enroll in the higher-level Jewish Philosophy course. This was one of the best decisions I made while at Bucknell. During one of my first days of class with Professor Groff almost thirteen years ago, I brought up the fact that I found a Jewish philosopher's work as showing a fascinating parallel to the work of Friedrich Nietzsche. Professor Groff's face lit up, and he enthusiastically asked me what connection I saw. It was at this point that I knew Professor Groff was willing to support my personal journey through the intellectual realms of philosophy. Each time I had a question about my favorite Jewish thinker, Baruch Spinoza, he would point me in a new direction to areas of Spinoza's thought that I had yet to explore. During my time at Bucknell, I took three philosophy courses with Professor Groff. In terms of my passion for philosophy, he was the one who ignited the spark that he saw in me as a freshman in his Jewish Philosophy course. Professor Groff, this book is a testament to your inspiring work as an educator.

One professor who was instrumental to my graduate business studies at Cornell University was Rob Symington. I was extremely fortunate to have Rob serve as head of the Investment Research and Asset Management immersion during my time at business school. Instead of offering a cookie cutter experience, Rob noted the fact that I came into business school with a significant finance background, and he pushed me to take that knowledge to an even deeper level. Rob has always been available for advice when I have needed it, even after graduation. Rob, thank you for your support.

The last professor I will mention, but surely not the least, is Professor Dan Awrey, who helped me in my graduate legal studies at Cornell Law School. I first encountered Professor Awrey during my third year of law school. From the first time I heard him speak, I knew he differed from other law school professors and had the same passion for financial markets and the law that I had. As I learned more and more with Professor Awrey, the breadth and depth of his knowledge astounded me. Given his substantial backgrounds as a practitioner who served as general counsel at a hedge fund, as well as a highly respected academic, he always pointed me in the right direction for further learning whenever I was interested in particular aspects of financial law. Professor Awrey has continued to make himself available for advice post-graduation. Professor Awrey, thank you for being the true highlight of my law school educational experience.

Next, I move on to my professional parents; mentors who have been instrumental in my professional development. These are four people who have encouraged my intellectual and critical thinking in the working world at different stages of my career. First, I would like to thank Phil Copulsky, whom I met during my first internship on Wall Street at Goldman Sachs. Phil has been an invaluable mentor throughout my journey to become a CFA charterholder and beyond. Next, I would like to thank Biagio Manieri, who was the first boss out of college to encourage my intellectual thinking about markets and who has continued to be a reliable mentor. I would also like to thank Joe Sarachek, who enabled me to have a meaningful graduate school internship experience during which I put my creative thinking about markets into practice. The last professional mentor I would like to thank is James Profestas. As I have navigated career transitions in my time after graduate school, there has been no one more encouraging or generous with their time in helping me maximize my professional potential.

I would also like to thank a special list of friends, though not exhaustive, who have repeatedly encouraged me and played a role in my realizing the goal of becoming a published author. In no particular order, I would like to thank Isaac Syed, Matthew Meads, David Janoff, Samuel Shapiro, Salvadore Diaz, Marisa Werner, Alexander Abosi, Justin Meshulam, Tucker Rekucki, Rachel Gibson, Cory Starkey, Eric Nadel, Ali Siddiqui, Brandon Young, Clayton Elliott, Pradeep Ambrose, and John Charles.

Finally, I would like to acknowledge those people in the literary profession without whom this book would not have come to fruition. I am grateful to both Brian Smith and Myles Thompson for their support throughout the lengthy journey that goes into publishing a book. Thank you for all your hard work on my behalf. And a special thank you to my cousin and trusted literary advisor throughout this entire process, Frances Black, without whom I could not imagine getting to this point.
