

A NOTE ON TRANSLITERATION OF JAPANESE WORDS AND NAMES

I have relied on the Hepburn romanization standard for transliterating Japanese names and words, using macrons for long vowels (for example, Abe Shinzō). Macrons are skipped for words commonly used in English, such as “Tokyo.” Family names come first for Japanese, Korean, and Chinese individuals referenced in the text as they would be in the original. If Japanese authors publish or are cited in English with their given name first or without the use of macrons, that is how they will appear in citations.
