

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

They say it takes a village. This book—the culmination of over a decade of research, writing, revision, and discussion—is, if nothing else, a communal effort. And it could not have been otherwise. Indeed, it is a long, winding, and unconventional path that stretches from my dissertation to the publication of this book, and it has ensnared many accomplices along the way. And so I owe a lot of gratitude to a lot of people who, wittingly or not, have played a role in the conception, evolution, and production of this project.

As the core foundation of this project dates back to my doctoral research, I'd like to first thank my dissertation advisors at the University of Notre Dame: Karl Ameriks and Fred Rush. I came in yelling "Kant" and came out yelling "Hegel," so thanks for supporting (or at least tolerating) this conversion. The many drafts you read and commented on; the many hours of consultation you generously gave; and the many, many forms of support provided along the way—deserve more thanks than I can give here. Also in this context I'd like to thank the late Gary Gutting, whose commitment to making philosophy more interesting and relevant for a broader audience has been a positive influence on this project, and on the discipline in general.

And thanks also to Vittorio Hösle, whose quirky and energetic brilliance introduced me to an exciting world of German scholarship.

As far as mentoring goes, Richard Eldridge gets as close to the Platonic form of mentorship as one can get, and for this deserves very special acknowledgment and thanks. I am incredibly grateful for the intellectual guidance and camaraderie that has evolved since that fortuitous encounter in Freiburg years ago. These have proved invaluable to many projects, most especially this one. Thanks, in particular, for encouraging me to write the book that I wanted to write. Du bist ein richtiger Mensch.

A number of other brilliant minds have played a major part in the genesis of this book. Special thanks to John Gibson and Keren Gorodeisky for very insightful comments on early drafts of the final chapter. And thanks to Aaron Meskin and James Shelley for hosting the Southern Aesthetics Workshop at Auburn University that made these exchanges possible. Thanks to Jonathan Neufeld for offering loads of helpful feedback along the way, and also for commandeering the Aesthetics Work Group at the College of Charleston, which has been an excellent venue for discussing aesthetics with colleagues and students. Thanks also to Michael Kelly for the many conversations about art and politics that have given shape to this book. And thanks to the American Society for Aesthetics for the many opportunities to present and exchange ideas relevant to this project in a productive and collaborative environment.

Still others have played some part in the making of this book, directly or indirectly, whom I'd like to thank: Raymond Geuss, Paul C. Taylor, Crispin Sartwell, Anne Eaton, Grant Kester, Lambert Zuidervart, Tom Mulherin, and probably many more.

This work has also benefitted immensely from conversations with artists and friends: Mel Chin, Helen Nagge, Thomas Woltz, Günther Schaeffer, Jefferson Pinder, Jacob Brault, Thom Klepach, Walter Early, Dave Teng Olson, Mike and Jake Simmons, and all the fine folks at the Black Mountain College Museum + Arts Center.

I have also had the great fortune of having strong institutional support for my research. A research grant from the Deutscher Akademischer Austauschdienst (DAAD) for the opportunity to spend a year immersed in research at Goethe Universität in Frankfurt, and to Prof. Christoph Menke for hosting me. In 2018, the Andrew Glasgow Writing Residency afforded me two precious weeks of focused writing among the lovely folks at the Penland School of Craft.

My students—more than they probably realize—have been a central part of this process, both in class and beyond. Thanks to Mina Juhn, Shannon Hebert Waldman, Lukas La Rivière, and Wes Tirey for keeping these conversations alive. And a very special thanks to Sam Morkal-Williams for being an awesome and immensely helpful research assistant, and to Jemma Natanson for swiftness and precision in all the eleventh-hour editorial work.

Thanks to present and past colleagues at Rice University, Wellesley College, and Warren Wilson College.

Thanks to everyone at Columbia University Press who helped bring this book to light. That includes, first of all, series editors, Gregg Horowitz and Lydia Goehr, for including this work in the “Philosophy, Social Criticism, and the Arts” series. A special thanks to Gregg, who more than anyone has put in the labor to see this thing through, from vision to revisions. Thanks to Wendy Lochner for editorial insight and guidance, and to Lowell Frye for running a tight but generously accommodating ship. Thanks also to Partha Chakrabartty, whose contribution to the book at the final stages go well beyond meticulous copyediting. And, of course, thanks to the anonymous reviewers for their excellent and valuable comments on the manuscript.

Finally, and most importantly, thanks to my family: Candace, Conley, and Lena. I suppose we all learned the hard way that The Time of Two Toddlers is not the best time to write a book. But it could not have happened without your seemingly infinite reserves of patience, support and encouragement. And so, a special “thank you” is in order to my wife, Candace, to whom I dedicate this book.
