ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

WE ARE grateful to the many organizations who have supported our research. The National Institutes of Health and of Mental Health supported the independent work of Richard Canter, Sylvia Forman, Michael Lowy, Philip Pamell, Julio Ruffini, June Starr, Harry Todd, and Nancy Williams. Klaus Koch's work was supported by the Social Science Research Council and the Wenner Gren Foundation. Carl McCarthy and John Rothenberger were supported by the Ford Foundation.

In 1964 funds for the overall project were requested of and denied by the National Institutes of Mental, Health, in part, they informed me, because of the young age of the principal investigator. I am particularly grateful to the Center for Advanced Study at Stanford, California, for being most supportive and willing to bet on a young anthropologist during the incipient period of planning. We thank the Wenner-Gren Foundation for support of a mini-conference held in Amherst, Massachusetts, in the fall of 1973 in an effort at preliminary assessment of our work. The results of this conference were presented in a special session at the annual meetings of the American Anthropological Association in November 1973.

I am especially appreciative of my colleagues at the University of California, Berkeley; in particular, Professors Elizabeth Colson and Eugene Hammel played important roles in what was always cooperative supervision of many of these young anthropologists as graduate students. Professor Herma Hill Kay of Boalt Hall Law School also provided continuing support and advice.

With all this help this manuscript could not have been completed without a support staff. Dr. Harry Todd helped me initiate the process of outlining the expectations for these contributions; he collected the essays, genially hounded the contributors until work was in, and helped edit the volume. I give special thanks to Grace Buzaljko, our much appreciated and respected editor. Mrs. Buzaljko's task was particularly onerous at times as she struggled with the writing of young scholars. All too often such work is not recognized as a totally indispensable part of the training of a scholar; Mrs. Buzaljko was teaching the newly initiated the art of precision in the use of language and of simplicity for communication's sake. Belinda Johns, my research assistant, typed and checked and double-checked the final manuscript with me with persistence, good cheer, and the care that comes from being interested in the substance as well as the task.

Finally, I would like to thank my family; it was my parents who very early trained me to think about law and justice; it was they who cared for the children while I was away visiting researchers at their field sites. My siblings and my husband continually contributed to the substance and methodology in my thinking about law in culture and society. The children contributed a good deal to morale; they more than anyone else protected my time so that I could get my work done.

As I have said, this has been an experiment in collaborative research, which includes the contributors to this volume and as well those four members of the Berkeley Village Law Project not specifically represented here; Bruce Cox, Sylvia Forman, Carl McCarthy, and Nancy Williams always enlivened and enriched discussions. For us as individual participants the experience has been rich although not always smooth. Whether the substantive work results in the cumulative impact I had earlier envisioned I leave for others to judge.
