This book was researched, written, and completed while I was associated with the University of Oxford, first as a graduate student and then as the Hedley Bull Research Fellow in International Relations. Accordingly, it is to the students, staff, and faculty of that institution that I owe principal thanks for creating the environment in which I could develop the ideas underpinning this book. Above all, I would like to express my deepest gratitude to Louise Fawcett, whose endless support, warm encouragement, and wise counsel have been instrumental in the development both of this book and of my own career. I could not have wished for a more helpful, patient, and reassuring mentor, and I consider myself incredibly lucky to be able to count myself among the many students and scholars whose paths have been shaped by her guidance and example. Special thanks are also due to Janina Dill, William James, Dominic Johnson, and Duncan Snidal, each of whom read significant portions of earlier draft material that made its way into the book. Beyond this, I have benefited immensely from discussions with innumerable friends and colleagues at the Department of Politics and International Relations, including Richard Caplan, Rosemary Foot, Todd Hall, Eddie Keene, Neil MacFarlane, and Andrea Ruggeri.

Merton College generously provided me with several research grants and scholarships during my time there. More recently, Brasenose College appointed me as a William Golding Junior Research Fellow, a position I am told is supposed to “add to the intellectual luster of the college.” I don’t know if I delivered on that, but I am nevertheless extremely grateful for the convivial atmosphere and superb facilities provided by the college, which helped make my years there my most enjoyable yet. The Jeffrey Fund, administered by Brasenose, also provided invaluable financial assistance in the later stages of the project. The Hedley Bull Research Fellowship gave me the most valuable gift of all—the time to figure out exactly what this book was about and to revise it into its present form. I would therefore like to recognize the support of the Hedley Bull Memorial Fund, and to apologize to the innumerable students who assumed that referencing the English school would earn them extra credit in their weekly essays.

Beyond Oxford, I have drawn on the advice and support of a range of individuals who offered valuable comments or took time to speak with me about my work at various stages of the process. Having often joked that I am a historian masquerading as a political scientist—and lived in fear that the reverse is in fact the case—I am especially grateful to the many “proper” historians who have graciously humored my occasional references to conceptual models and causal mechanisms when my mask momentarily slipped. Among them, I thank in particular Steve Casey, who offered countless excellent suggestions to sharpen the case studies and has become an invaluable source of sage advice, having trodden a similar path once before. I also thank Andrew Preston, who probably does not realize the degree to which he influenced my career, having single-handedly ignited my interest in the history of U.S. foreign relations when I was a lowly undergraduate, and inspired me to return to academia a couple of years later. More recently, Peter Trubowitz has been a constant source of encouragement and inspiration. Jeff Friedman restored my confidence in the project and helped me distill its key contributions at a crucial moment. In addition to those already mentioned, I’d also like to thank several others for sharing their insights and helping me think through various aspects of the project, including Gareth Davies, Ben Fordham, Robin Markwica, Jeff Michaels, Phil Potter, William Quandt, Rob Schub, and Melissa Willard-Foster.

Beyond those already mentioned, I am very grateful for the generous financial assistance offered by a range of other individuals and organizations, including the Harry S. Truman Library Institute and the Economics and Social Research Council. The University of Oxford’s Vice Chancellor’s Fund also provided invaluable support, as did the Cyril Foster Fund at the Department of Politics and International Relations. Finally, I was fortunate to be the recipient of the Deirdre and Paul Malone Prize in International Relations, which granted me the resources to jump-start the next stage of the project. More importantly, it afforded me an opportunity to get to know its benefactor, David Malone, who has since become a mentor and to whom I owe a debt of gratitude for his generosity and warm friendship.

A small army of individuals helped me navigate the holdings of several archives across the United States. I am particularly grateful to David Clark, Sam Rushay, Randy Sowell, and Tammy Williams at the Truman Library; Mary Burtzloff at the Eisenhower Library; John Wilson at the Johnson Library; Dorissa Martinez at the Nixon Library; Scott Gower at the National Defense University; and Jim Zobel at the MacArthur Memorial Archives. My thanks also to Conrad Crane, who introduced me to the excellent resources at the U.S. Army Heritage and Education Center, and to all the staff of the Manuscript Division at the Library of Congress, who were unfailingly helpful and efficient. I would also like to record my thanks to all those who graciously agreed to be interviewed for this project, oftentimes at considerable length. George Casey and David Petraeus kindly granted permission for me to consult their papers at the National Defense University.

At Columbia University Press, I thank Stephen Wesley both for his enthusiasm for the project and for the efficiency with which he shepherded it through to production, assisted ably by Christian Winting. Marisa Lastres made sure the ensuing process ran like clockwork, with Ryan Perks responsible for polishing the manuscript so effectively. Credit for the awesome cover design goes to Elliott Cairns. Bob Schwarz compiled the index with great skill. I am also significantly indebted to three anonymous reviewers, each of whom offered invaluable suggestions that helped fine-tune the manuscript. Ria McDonald provided research assistance at the eleventh hour, which was instrumental in getting the final manuscript across the line.

Finally, and most importantly, I thank my family, without whom none of this would have been possible. My parents, Maxine and Les, have been my earliest and strongest supporters since before I can remember. My granddad, Ernst, stoked my interest in history from a young age.

I owe the greatest debt of all to my wife, Abi, whose love and support has sustained me throughout this process. She has also read—and reread—more of my writing than is reasonable, serving as the best sounding board, proofreader, and editor in chief I could possibly have hoped for. Osi, by contrast, has not read a single word, but has nevertheless overseen much of the process while making his feelings known about the long hours spent at the computer rather than on the sofa with him. It is to them both that I dedicate this book.
