All authors accumulate debts of gratitude. Ours are many and varied and have only grown since we started this project in 2015. Ben and Ruth did more than a 160 interviews and led on developing and expanding both the empirical work and intellectual scope of the project well beyond anything Rasmus had dared to imagine when he first suggested a closer qualitative look at news avoidance.

Among our colleagues, we build on the work of many academics interested in people's relationships with media and news. Special thanks go to Irene Costera Meijer, Kim Christian Schröder, Richard Fletcher, and Stephen Coleman, all of whom joined us in an early workshop as we developed ideas that became central to the work that underlies this book. Multiple configurations of research teams at the Reuters Institute for the Study of Journalism were also instrumental in helping us think through how to approach this subject and make sense of what we were finding along the way. Antonis Kalogeropoulos, Kim Andersen, Morten Skovsgaard, Stephanie Edgerly, Kathy Cramer, Matt Carlson, and Talia Stroud gave invaluable feedback at various stages as our project developed, and over the years an entire scholarly community specifically focused on news avoidance has also formed, to whom we are very grateful, but whose numbers have grown too high to name.

We are also particularly indebted to the anonymous reviewers who took the time to carefully read, reflect on, and engage with our work amid a global pandemic and invariably stressful circumstances in their own lives. Their insights pushed us to clarify our own thinking and were enormously helpful in that regard.

Many thanks to Kantar and Essman Research/SPPG for their help in recruiting study participants and arranging interviews as well as to the team at YouGov for their assistance with our survey data collection. We also thank Rebecca Edwards, Nick Mathews, and Gretel Kahn, who provided critical assistance on myriad practical and logistical matters involved in conducting this study across three countries and finishing this manuscript. Thanks to Philip Leventhal and Columbia University Press for their support in seeing this project through to publication.

At the more practical level, we also thank the Google News Initiative for supporting the ongoing Digital News Project at the Reuters Institute, which, in addition to producing the Digital News Report survey that we draw on, also made it possible to invest significant time and effort in the extensive qualitative research that much of the book is based on. We are likewise appreciative of the support provided by the University of Minnesota, whose Grant-in-Aid funds made our U.S. interviews possible, as well as by the Hubbard School of Journalism and Mass Communication, whose funding we drew on to conduct our survey of U.S. news consumers.

As part of a team of collaborators, each of us has individual thanks to express. Ben is particularly thankful for his partner and his parents, whose encouragement, thoughtfulness, and patience over the years made this book possible. He also thanks his colleagues at Minnesota for their camaraderie and support, especially their willingness to allow him to leave for three years to return to the Reuters Institute to continue researching news audiences. He also thanks Rasmus for hiring him as a postdoc to lead what was then an inchoate version of this project and both him and Ruthie for being fantastic collaborators and coauthors from whom he has learned immeasurably. Ruth is grateful to Rasmus and Ben for inviting her to be a part of this adventure and for ensuring it was not just intellectually fulfilling but also fun. Many thanks to her friends and family for their unfailing encouragement and to IE University staff and faculty for unflagging support. Rasmus thanks his whole family for their continued support for his decision to spend so much of his life working on journalism and Ben and Ruthie for being such an inspiration to work with.

And, finally, we thank our interviewees for changing the way we see consistent news avoidance, how we see the news, and, indeed, how we see ourselves through the lens of their experiences. The analysis contained in these pages is possible only because of their willingness to talk with openness, at length, and in such nuanced ways about their choices and their lives, and we hope the book will be as thought-provoking for readers as the process of working on it has been for us.
