

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book has been the primary focus of my thinking and writing for roughly the past six years. During this time I have undertaken fieldwork in various parts of the world, had two primary academic homes, and been fortunate enough to be a visiting fellow and to present this work at a range of universities. Many people have contributed significantly to this project and to the book that it has become.

I am sincerely thankful to the colleagues who made the time to read and provide feedback on draft chapters. This commentary has been invaluable and has shaped my thinking profoundly. Particular thanks to Michelle Bastian, Etienne Benson, Brad Bolman, Veit Braun, Brett Buchanan, Matthew Chrulew, Margaret Cook, Eileen Crist, Thibault De Meyer, Vinciane Despret, David Farrier, Franklin Ginn, Margret Grebowicz, Donna Haraway, Matthew Kearnes, Lindsay Kelley, Eben Kirksey, Jean Langford, Jamie Lorimer, Stephen Muecke, Ursula Münster, Astrida Neimanis, Emily O’Gorman, Craig Santos Perez, Hugo Reinert, Harriet Ritvo, Deborah Bird Rose, Isabelle Stengers, and Anna Tsing.

I would also like to thank the many talented PhD and honors students that I have worked with while completing this book. Our discussions have often taken me in productive new directions, and I have benefited immensely from all of your inspiring work: Hélène Ahlberger Le Deunff,

Emily Crawford, Kate Judith, Laura McLauchlan, Jamie Wang, and Sam Widin.

This book is, in very large part, a product of my time as part of the Environmental Humanities group at the University of New South Wales. My many wonderful colleagues in this group challenged and provoked me; they introduced me to a range of new ideas and deepened my understandings of old ones. Toward the end of my time on this project I moved to the University of Sydney, where my new colleagues, in particular those in the Department of Gender and Cultural Studies and the Sydney Environment Institute, provided a stimulating and supportive home for the final stages of the work on this book.

During this period of research (2013–2018) I have also been fortunate enough to be able to spend extended periods of time as a visitor at the Rachel Carson Center for Environment and Society in Munich (2014–2016, intermittent), the KTH Environmental Humanities Laboratory in Stockholm (2014), the Anthropology Department at MIT (2018), and the Center for Pacific Islands Studies at the University of Hawai‘i at Mānoa (2018). Thank you to my hosts—Christof Mauch, Sverker Sörlin, Stefan Helmreich and Heather Paxson, and Alex Mawyer—and their many colleagues for conversations, reading groups, and discussions that enriched this work in so many ways.

This book has also benefited from conversations and presentations of draft chapters during shorter visits—from a couple of days to a couple of weeks—at many universities and other institutions around the world, often alongside or on my way to fieldwork. In particular, I would like to thank my hosts at Aarhus University, the American Museum of Natural History, Columbia University, Curtin University, École Normale Supérieure Paris, UCLA, UC Santa Cruz, the University of Edinburgh, the University of Leeds, Université Libre de Bruxelles, the University of Oxford, and the University of Pennsylvania.

The fieldwork that informs this book has taken me to numerous parts of the globe and brought me into conversation with many fascinating people. I can’t hope to name them all here but would like to offer particular thanks to some of those who went above and beyond to show me around, to tell me their stories, or to help me in countless other ways: in Brisbane: Darryl Jones, Trixie Benbrook, Kristen Dangerfield, and Matt Brown; in Hawai‘i: Hannah Kihalani Springer, Mike Hadfield, Sheila Conant, Donna Ball,

Paul Banko, Sam ‘Olu Gon III, Rich Switzer, Alan Lieberman, Nohea Ka‘awa, John Replogle, and Shalan Crysdale; in Hoek van Holland: Sabine Rietkerk, Harm Niesen, and Colin Ryall; in the Mojave: Tim Shields, Bill Boorman, and Roy Averill-Murray; on Rota: Stan Taisacan, Thomas Mendiola, Sarah Faegre, Phil Hannon, Beth Chagnon, Dacia Wiitala, Doug Page, and Earl Campbell. Finally, Nicola Clayton and Thomas Bugnyar both made time in their busy schedules, more than once, to meet with me and talk about corvid behavioral research. Thank you to you all.

The fieldwork and visiting positions that inform this book would not have been possible without the generous funding provided by the Australian Research Council (DP150103232) and the Alexander von Humboldt Foundation, Germany.

The wonderful staff at Columbia University Press has, as always, made the publication process a seamless one. My particular thanks to Wendy Lochner for her guidance and insight and to Lowell Frye, Michael Haskell, and Robert Fellman for their support and careful attention to detail.

Finally, I would like to acknowledge Emily O’Gorman, my wife, for her ongoing support and for the many inspiring conversations that guided me on my way.
