Although the process of research and writing may seem like a solitary endeavor, I have been inspired, helped, challenged, and encouraged by many collectives and individuals along the way in completing this book. Many thanks to the archivists and archival staff who have aided me, especially in the special collections at the University of Texas–Pan American (now UT-RGV), the University of Texas at Arlington, the University of Texas at Austin, and Texas A&M University–Corpus Christi. I would also like to thank Kerry Webb, senior editor at UT Press, for her guidance and encouragement. I am eternally grateful to the readers who spent hours poring over my manuscript and giving me such precise and useful suggestions. Thank you very much.

The Llano Grande Center for Research and Development created a space that used history and storytelling to empower and build community. Llano Grande helped me understand the transformative capacity of stories. Thank you to Francisco Guajardo and Miguel Guajardo for your work and inspiration.

While I was at the University of Texas at Austin I benefited from institutional and student-made spaces committed to Chicano/a studies as an intellectual and political field. The students who created the Advanced Seminar in Chicano/a Research forged a rigorous environment of collective mentorship, political activism, and academic endeavor. Thank you to Luis Alvarez, Estevan Azcona, Manuel Callahan, Rebecca Gamez, Alan Gomez, Pablo Gonzalez, Verónica Martínez-Matsuda, Toni Nelson-Herrera, Isabella Quintana, Gilberto Rosas, Lilia Rosas, and Geoff Valdes for your commitment to the work and to community.

In the history department I found dedicated faculty whom I looked to as examples of excellent scholars, teachers, and mentors. Thank you to my committee members, Jose Limon, Anne Martinez, and James Sidbury, and to my advisors, Laurie Green and Emilio Zamora. They each helped guide me through my project from its earliest formulations, and I am grateful for their mentorship.

While in Austin, I was fortunate to fall in with the most amazing group of women who have been there with me along the way from literally the first day of graduate school until now. To Olga Herrera, Verónica Martínez-Matsuda, Jennifer Najera, Isabella Quintana, and Virginia Raymond: you are inspirations of love, political activism, and committed scholarship, and I treasure your friendship. I have particularly relied on Veronica's friendship and guidance and have run every question by her, big and small. I will always remember Laura Padilla's humor, intelligence, and wit, and she is deeply missed.

At the University of Texas at Arlington, I was lucky to join a friendly and collegial department and a thriving Center for Mexican American Studies that welcomed me and provided support for my work in various important ways. Thanks especially to Katy Beebe, Stephanie Cole, Joyce Goldberg, David Lafavor, Steven Maizlish, Sarah Rose, and Kenyon Zimmer for their advice, feedback on my work, friendship, and collaboration. Steve was completing his book as I was finishing mine, and it was a pleasure to check in with a fellow traveler to share our updates and anxieties.

I must also express my deep gratitude to Marvin Dulaney and Christian Zolniski. As history department chair and CMAS director, respectively, they provided funds to reduce my teaching load during an especially critical moment in writing this book. I thank both of them for their support.

As the director of the Center for Mexican American Studies, Christian Zolniski reinvigorated an interdisciplinary faculty writing workshop that was key to helping me get my chapters into shape. Thank you to Christian Zolniski, William Arce, Ignacio Ruiz-Perez, David Lafavor, Erin Murrah-Mandril, Ana Gregorio Cano, Isabel Montemayor, and Taryn Ozuna Allen for their valuable feedback. Thanks also to Jacqueline Fay for her friendship and for spending countless hours across a table at a coffee shop as we plugged along with our writing.

I relied on the help of staff and students who provided key administrative and research support. Thanks go to Diana Botello for her administrative help and to Michael Moore and Cory Wells, who provided research and technical assistance.

Upon the advice of Vice Provost Maria Martinez-Cosio, I registered for the Faculty Success Program during my second year at UTA. It was a great piece of advice, and in addition to helping me develop needed organizational skills to balance the demands and priorities of my work and life, the program connected me to three other scholars who formed a group to provide accountability to each other. We have continued our weekly calls for three years now, and these women have become friends as well as accountability partners. I thank Alison Calhoun, Kristina Hood, and Julia McQuade for their constant advice and encouragement.

My greatest source of inspiration and strength has come from my family. I thank the Rodriguez family, especially my mother-in-law and father-in-law, Becky and Cecilio, who have sustained me with their love and prayers.

To my families, los Becerra y los Salinas, this work has been for you. My big, extended Mexican family has been the foundation of my identity as a Chicana, Tejana, norteña. They have been the models of openness, generosity, and community that defines the Valley for me. I thank all my tíos and tías who are still here, and those who have already gone, for the solid bonds of family that have kept me emotionally and intellectually connected to the Valley despite my physical distance: Salvador (Berta), Israel (Maria), Ismael (Elma), Manuel, Elva (Gilberto), Ernestina, Eloisa, Alicia (Bruno), Felicitas (Natividad), Luis (Amparo), Manuela (Gene), and Leonel (Irma) on my mother's side, and Cesar (Delia), Jorge (Esperanza), Amparo, Francisca (Chon), Rene (Rosie), and Ernesto (Sandra) on my father's side. My cousin Marco Bazan has been like a brother to me all my life.

My parents, Armando and Delia Salinas, have given their love and affection abundantly and freely, and I am deeply grateful to them. My mother has been my role model since I was a child, instilling in me a love for reading and learning, and I have tried to emulate her honesty and integrity. My brothers, Orlando and Carlos, have been steadfast in their love and support, and I appreciate their camaraderie and friendship.

Finally, I would like to acknowledge my husband, Marcel Rodriguez, and my daughter, Daniela Inés. Marcel has lived with this project for many years now. He cleared the way for me when necessary and sacrificed his own work at times to make room for mine. The ebbs and flows of writing can pattern a life, and when there is a household with two writers, working around each other's schedules can be an intricate dance. There is no one I would rather dance with. Thank you for your support and encouragement. Thank you also for our daughter, Daniela, the light and delight of our lives. She is a funny and wise little girl, and I am forever grateful.
