

Acknowledgments

Most of the research for this book has been funded by the Social Sciences and the Humanities Research Council of Canada, which I thankfully acknowledge. Among other things, such funding has allowed me to bring on board several highly talented students and research assistants. Gabriela Pechlaner was among them during her doctoral studies with me (2002–2007). We have collaborated since then and long after her graduation. In fact, several chapters in this book originated as co-authored articles or book chapters, so I am heavily indebted to her. Other research assistants who helped with data gathering include Giselle Liberman, Anelyse Weiler, and most significantly, Efe Can Gürcan. Efe started his doctoral studies with me in 2011, and we have established a highly productive intellectual relationship. He contributed significant research for some of the chapters in this book, for which I am very thankful. Given the strong help I received from these assistants, especially from Gabriela and Efe, I could easily use the first-person plural “we” throughout the book. Yet, given all the major changes and updates I have done throughout, and to take full responsibility for this manuscript, my style here will be the first-person singular.

Part of my research and writing was done while I held the Highfield Fellowship at the Centre for Advanced Studies at the University of Nottingham in the United Kingdom (January–April 2012), with a project on food security. My thanks go to Adam Morton (then in the School of Politics and International Relations) and Wyn Morgan (School of Economics) for nominating me and for contributing to this exciting intellectual experience. Adam, now in the Department of Political Economy at the University of Sydney, was and continues to be a thoughtful interlocutor.

During the fall of 2014, I was fortunate to be back at my doctoral alma mater, the University of Wisconsin, Madison, as the Tinker Visiting Professor. I thank Alberto Vargas at the Latin American, Caribbean, and Iberian Studies Program for the invitation and friendly kindness during my stay. Many thanks also go to Jack Kloppenburg for supporting Alberto's nomination and offering me an academic home in the Department of Community and Environmental Sociology. Besides the rare sensation of having arrived "home" as the shuttle bus from Chicago approached Lake Mendota, the multiple seminars and conversations in Madison were highly stimulating for some of my writing in this book. Drafts of chapters 4, 6, and 7 were presented at several forums in which I got very useful feedback. These forums included the research seminar in the sociology of economic change and development in the Department of Sociology. It was great to see my former professors Erik Olin Wright and Jess Gilbert there and to find that, while most people were different from those in my times as a graduate student, the intellectual vibrancy was unchanged. I thank Gay Seidman for asking me to give a paper and for her friendship during my pleasant stay in Madison.

I made other presentations at the Rural Sociological Society and the Latin American Studies Association, two of my main academic reference groups. My discussions with Doug Constance, Horacio Mackinlay, Tony Winson, and Steve Zahnizer were particularly helpful. Horacio was especially helpful in clarifying some results of the 1992 agrarian reform in Mexico. In Vancouver, BC, I presented a draft of chapter 7 at a research colloquium in my new academic home as of 2015, Simon Fraser University's School for International Studies. I am deeply thankful to my colleagues for their critical feedback. Alec Dawson was generous in highlighting problems in the chapter during his introductory remarks, and John Harriss, Jeff Checkel, Liz Cooper, Chris Gibson, and Paul Meyer provided useful skeptical comments. Greg Feldman provided the sole sympathetic remark, which strengthened my determination to sharpen my arguments and presentation. Separately, Hannah Wittman and Juan Enrique Ramos Salas also gave me useful feedback on chapter 7.

Through the process of publishing other articles or book chapters, some of which served as the basis for this book, I got plenty of generous and constructive critiques from anonymous reviewers and other colleagues. Special thanks as book editors are due to Alessandro Bonanno, Larry Busch, María Vidal de Haymes, Geoff Lawrence, and Steve Wolf. For chapter 1, Christina Holmes, James Klepeck, and Karine Peschard provided useful comments, as did Liz Fitting. John Harriss and four anonymous reviewers for the Canadian Journal of Development Studies, which published an earlier version, also offered very valuable input.

A version of chapter 4 was presented at the plenary panel on NAFTA and other free trade agreements at the World Congress for Rural Sociology held in Toronto in August 2016. Along with the public, organizer Doug Constance and my panel colleagues, Hugh Campbell and Jennifer Clapp, posed provocative questions that helped me sharpen the argument.

An early version of chapter 5 was presented at a workshop entitled Migrant Rights in an Era of Globalization: The Mexico-US Case and held on 13 April 2011 at the University of Chicago. Javier Ramos Salas and two anonymous reviewers for the Journal of Poverty provided useful comments. My exposure to migration studies dates from my early days as a graduate student at the University of Texas, Austin, where I participated in seminars led by Bryan Roberts, Norman Long, and Juarez Rubens Brandão Lopes. At Wisconsin, the Mexican Student Association invited Jorge Bustamante for a lecture at a time when he was becoming the authority on the Mexican perspective in undocumented migration. Alejandro Portes has also been a central source for my understanding of migration, and I appreciate our exchanges in Madison and later in Zacatecas. My postdoctoral year at the Center for US-Mexican Studies at the University of California, San Diego, put me in contact with its director, Wayne Cornelius, one of the foremost US scholars on migration. From 2003 to 2012 I participated in the doctoral program in development studies at the Universidad Autónoma de Zacatecas in Mexico, invited by its founding director, Raúl Delgado Wise. Migration and development is the main strength of my colleagues there, and I learned much from all of them, including Rodolfo García Zamora, James Cypher, Humberto Márquez Covarrubias, Miguel Moctezuma Longoria, and Henry Veltmeyer. My work with Mexican farmworkers in Canada has been a critical encouragement for chapter 5, which started in collaboration with my former student Kerry Preibisch, who, sadly, passed away too early, in 2016. Her engaged scholarship is an inspiration.

Earlier versions of other chapters and sections were first published as journal articles as follows and listed in the bibliography: chapter 1, Otero

2012 and 2013; chapter 2, Pechlaner and Otero 2008; chapter 3, Otero, Pechlaner, Gürcan, and Liberman 2015; chapter 4, Pechlaner and Otero 2015; chapter 5, Otero 2011, Preibisch and Otero 2014; chapter 6, Otero, Pechlaner, and Gürcan 2013; chapter 7, Otero, Pechlaner, Liberman, and Gürcan 2018. They were all heavily revised, reorganized, and updated for this book. Yet my deep gratitude goes to my coauthors and the colleagues who served as anonymous reviewers for their critical engagement with our research, resulting in kind and generous help.

The Neoliberal Diet

THIS PAGE INTENTIONALLY LEFT BLANK